WHAT WE THINK

Come home Tony!

There used to be a popular ditty titled 'I've been everywhere, man'. Maybe this should be Tony Blair's theme tune – perhaps with self-accompaniment on his own guitar. He was at it again last month, jetting around the world: one moment in Washington, the next in Seoul, then in Peking. It becomes difficult to keep up with the fellow as he gallivants about, seemingly oblivious to the problems piling up here in Britain: rotten public transport; failing hospitals; third-rate schools; industry on the skids and immigrants flooding in as fast as ever (his Government is now telling us that we are going to need a million more homes to cope with them).

Tony Blair is clearly bored and fed up with the country he was elected to govern. His stock here is falling by the hour. But overseas he's the flavour of the moment. A rousing reception in the US Congress; a guard of honour as the guest of China! Vain politicians who have no grip revel in this sort of thing. It's all a substitute for the respect on the home front that they simply cannot earn by positive deeds for their own people.

Nationalist comment

We started this piece by saying 'Come home Tony', but would it be any damned use if he did? He simply hasn't a clue how to govern Britain, and so for all the value he is here he might as well continue on his global travels – but for the annoying fact that we, the British taxpayers, are footing the bill for all his overseas wining, dining, posturing and inspecting.

What a bunch of no-hopers this Government is, and what a feeble clown we have at the head of it!

The Kelly tragedy and government lies

We pass on our deepest condolences, as everyone should, to the family of Dr. David Kelly, who apparently committed suicide last month after being browbeaten beyond endurance over the affair of the alleged 'sexing up' of the reports on Iraq's alleged "weapons of mass-destruction." This said, we are disinclined to take the line adopted by many journalists: that the Government and its spin doctor-in-chief Alastair Campbell are to blame for the Doctor's death – not at least unless evidence comes to light that he might have died in circumstances other than those officially reported.

If an individual under pressure finds the pressure too much and takes the option of suicide as an escape from it, that is his decision and no one else's; to us, it seems an extraordinary decision for a man who had a loving wife and family who would be left to

This said, it seems to us that the controversy over Saddam's weapons is now becoming bogged down in much too much of a morass of detail, all depending on evidence as to whether Dr. Kelly was the source of the 'sexing-up' story. Could it be that certain people in politics and the media are deliberately placing the focus on this argument over detail to distract the British public from the wider picture?

And the wider picture simply is one in which the Government is trying to put over a story which was quite obviously preposterous from Day One: the story that the Iraqi leader had dangerous weapons in his possession which, unless he were stopped, he would use against Britain and/or the United States. Anyone who could seriously believe such a story for two minutes must surely be so feeble-minded as to warrant being placed in a home for people of that affliction. Whilst we do not rate members of Tony Blair's Government very highly in the intelligence stakes, we do not believe they really are quite that lacking in little grey cells. It all means, in effect, that they are liars – liars, moreover, who would gladly consign British service folk, as well as thousands of innocent Iraqis, to their graves in pursuit of their own despicable globalist political agenda.

If there is such a place as hell, Blair & Co. certainly deserve to rot in it.

Life better under Saddam

And while we are on the subject of Iraq, it seems that the consequences of the Anglo-American 'liberation' are quickly being brought home to the people there. A report in the Daily Mail on July 3rd spoke of the growing unrest in the country as many are finding that life is now much worse for them than it was under their former leader.

One complaint was that 400,000 soldiers of the Iraqi army were left penniless when the Americans decided to disband the force. Looting and sabotage at power stations means that there is little electricity. Another complaint is that 30,000 professional people, such as doctors, engineers, teachers and professors were sacked immediately after the war purely because of their associations with Saddam's B'ath party – in the words of the Mail report, “a crucial layer of society stripped away by the coalition overnight.” This all sounds like what happened in Germany at the end of World War II, when the hateful mania for purging the country of ‘Nazis’ resulted in its deprivation of many of its best brains, and consequent suffering for the people who were supposedly being ‘liberated’.

The upshot of the ‘liberation’ of Iraq is that popular anger is growing and intensifying as the people see that the Brits and the Americans are not there to do them any favours, despite much rhetoric to the contrary. This anger is manifesting itself in acts of violence against the occupiers which can only grow as things get steadily worse. There is now talk of Britain and the US sending many thousands more troops to the country – at vast expense. Blair and Bush have dug a seemingly bottomless pit for themselves by their ill-considered and wholly immoral invasion – and all at the behest of their Zionist masters.

IDS crawls after black vote

Elsewhere in this issue we are featuring a photograph which illustrates the frenzied efforts the Tories are now making to court the favour of Britain's Afro-Caribbean community. Instead of addressing themselves to the concerns of native Britons, who are gravitating increasingly to the BNP, the Tories are clearly turning their backs on these people so as to ‘out-Blair’ Blair in winning ethnic minority support.

It was announced at the end of June that the country's leading black newspaper, The Voice, was now championing the Tories, saying that Labour had taken the black vote too much for granted and that the Tories were now showing themselves to be “readily available and easily accessible.”

We are sure they are. With the voting power of ‘ethnic’ Britain increasing all the time, and with mainstream politicians not giving a damn what they have to do or say to cuddle up to it, we can expect to witness an ever-more unedifying contest between the parties to see who can grovel the most shamelessly and brown-nose to the greatest effect.

Thank goodness Britain has the BNP!

Brighter than us?

“Asian children are now outstripping their white classmates in the run-up to the GCSEs,” it was reported in the Daily Mail of the 1st July. The report went on to say that “A Department of Education and Skills census published yesterday reveals that Indian, Bangladeshi and Chinese students are outperforming white pupils.” Sadly, the report continued: “Afro-Caribbean children are making below-average progress.”

These findings could well be true. However, they omit mention of a fact that is known to most geneticists: that different races show different mental development at different ages. For instance, at primary level the difference in school performance between white and black children is less acute than it becomes as the respective groups grow older. Likewise, Asians can excel Whites in the teens but not necessarily later.

If the school performance figures relating to Whites and these various Asians were translated into national performance by countries of origin on the world stage, we would see India, Bangladesh and China showing higher levels of development and achievement than Britain. As everyone knows, this simply isn't happening. It therefore suggests that there is rather more to racial aptitudes than the mere ability of schoolchildren of a certain age-group to get good marks in exams.

For reasons of space, this must exclude consideration of other factors influencing academic effort and performance. For instance, the same report says that girls are outperforming boys in class. No one would suggest that this means that the female sex is necessarily thereby more intelligent, though it may well mean that in today's cultural climate in Britain girls are motivated to try harder.

Women's preference

While we are on the subject of differences between the sexes, another report should cause much interest. This came from the Government's Office for National Statistics. Recent findings in a survey from this department will be disappointing to feminists and the legions of the politically correct.

They stated that no less than six out of seven women would rather be at home looking after their children than pursue full-time careers. Four out of five women think of their husbands as the main breadwinners, and even among the best-educated women half would give up work for their families if they really had to.

This underlines a fact which we have always known but which many refuse to admit: that feminists are less interested in what women really want than in what they (the feminists) think is good for them.

‘Russian’ takeover?

When the news first broke last month that a ‘Russian’ billionaire would be taking over Chelsea Football Club, our suspicions were immediately aroused.

Genuine Russian people, whatever their admirable qualities, are not usually distinguished in the field of international big business and takeovers; nor are any but a tiny few of them billionaires.

In due course, all was revealed. The gentleman who had become the new boss at Stamford Bridge was a Mr. Roman Abramovich. Though only 36 years of age, Mr. Abramovich is reported as having £4 billion in the bank, part of full assets adding up to £16 billion. These include, just as minor chattels, a country mansion and a big yacht. He is now reputed to be building a personal gymadjacent to his home which will cost a trifling £2.5 million.

In a page-size story in The Sunday Telegraph of the 6th July, Mr. Abramovich was reported as describing himself as “a Jew first and a Russian second.” Fair enough. That is how most of his tribe see themselves. The annoying thing is the way the media persist in nearly always referring to them in terms of the countries they grew up or now reside in rather than by their ethnicity. Thus Dr. Henry Kissinger is a former ‘German’ now naturalised as an ‘American’, while Tory Malcolm Rifkind is ‘British’ or ‘Scottish’, according to your preference.

Just how does a man make £16 billion by the time he is 36? Well, apparently Mr. Abramovich got into business shortly after the Soviet collapse. With the privatisation of former state-owned industries, the workers in those industries were allocated shares which were worth very little. Unemployed and hungry, they were desperate for ready cash and more than willing to trade these pieces of paper for the wherewithal to feed their families – if only for just a while.

Along came Mr. Roman Abramovich and people like him and offered to buy up these pieces of paper, the value of which subsequently soared. Abramovich later went into oil and multiplied his gains. He was one of those who mopped up underpriced state assets in return for financial support to the politicians disposing of them. With the coming of ‘democracy’ to Russia, this is how the system operates.

Anyway, Mr. Abramovich has the blessing of Sports Minister and Chelsea fan Tony Banks, who deems him “a fit and proper person” to run the club.

Some recommendation!

Stand by the BNP!

AS many readers will already know, last month I was issued a summons to appear before a British National Party disciplinary tribunal to answer seven charges relating to alleged actions prejudicial to the good of the party. This tribunal will sit early this month.

I view this as a logical development – indeed, as some will hope, as the culmination – of a process which began in 1999 and in which the clear aim has always been to drum me out of the party which I founded, along with a few other friends and supporters, 21 years ago, and which we built up to the point at which, in 1999, the party was able to field a full complement of candidates throughout England and Scotland in the elections to the European Parliament.

Many readers will also know that in support of these charges two vitriolic attacks have been made on me in the BNP general members' bulletin for July and in the July issue of the party's magazine Identity. It seems to me from these attacks that the intention is to pronounce me 'guilty' before I have even stepped into the dock!

In addition, I have heard that Nick Griffin and Tony Lecomber were very busy last month telephoning key party members around the country in attempts to justify their pending action. From feedback I have received, they did not sound too confident of the rectitude of their position but, on the contrary, seemed rather as if they were "protesting too much."

In view of the pending disciplinary enquiry, it would be wrong for me here to comment on any of the charges being made against me. I believe that our party's internal disciplinary procedures should conform as closely as possible to standard British legal ones, which are governed, among other things, by a law of sub judice – something of which my accusers seem to be completely ignorant. Suffice it to say here that I shall defend myself vigorously against the accusations that have been flung against me. When these proceedings are finished with, I shall of course feel freer to express my opinions on the charges and on other matters, irrespective of how things go.

PARTY OF FREE SPEECH?

On the face of it, the attempt to drive me out of the BNP seems to stem from certain fundamental differences I have had with Mr. Nick Griffin ever since his assumption of the party leadership four years ago. On occasions, these differences have been given an airing in Spearhead because I believe that in a party of free speech members do have the right to express their opinions on such matters in the open – just as occurred when I was party leader, when no attempt was ever made to suppress such free discussion.

There is one charge about which I can comment here because it does not form part of the pending case against me but has been given considerable airing in party circles by my opponents. This is that I have never accepted the verdict of the members in the BNP leadership election in 1999 which returned Mr. Griffin to the position of party chairman, and that I simply cannot bear no longer being BNP leader.

The fact is that in these very columns in our October 1999 issue I made a statement of acceptance of the members' verdict in that election and called upon everyone in the party to work together for the good of the BNP, irrespective of where they had previously stood on the leadership issue.

But this did not mean that I would not venture into the field of criticism if the subsequent actions of the new leadership called for it. I have done just that on occasions, but I have also given praise when the achievements of the party have called for praise. Is the BNP to become a party in which dissent is forbidden? It would seem that some would like it that way.

RETIREMENT

But there is another thing I would like to say in connection with the leadership issue. My close friends know about this but my opponents will not recognise it.

From back in the mid-1990s I began to think seriously about retiring from the BNP leadership just as soon as I could find someone suitable to succeed me. I felt then, as I feel now, that our party is one which ideally should be led by a man younger than I. I was also greatly attracted to the idea of the less stressful life that I would be able to enjoy when freed from the burdens of the BNP leadership.

However, I did not willingly surrender my position as party leader for one reason. I was absolutely opposed to the idea of this job going to Nick Griffin.

I had been able to make an assessment of Mr. Griffin during three years in which he worked with me in 1996-99, and I had come to the view that his assumption of the leadership would be a very bad thing for the party. I have not changed my view on this matter, notwithstanding the very encouraging election results which the party has enjoyed.

It is not the place here to go into detailed explanations of why I came to this view about Mr. Griffin. Suffice it to say that it is a view I adopted with perfect sincerity and absolute conviction.

Were there an alternative – and younger – candidate for the leadership of the party in whom I could have faith, I would be more than happy to support him. I hope that in the not-too-distant future such a person will emerge.

In the meantime, let us deal with the present de facto situation. I shall answer the charges to which I have referred but, by the time these words are read, I may have been expelled from the BNP. What then should be done?

What should be done is not in doubt. Everybody should remain loyal to our party, as I will remain loyal to it notwithstanding that I may have to work in support of it from the outside. Contrary to what my accusers are now claiming, I have absolutely no intention of launching a breakaway party. There is no future in such enterprises, and I believe that there is no future in any of the separate mini-nationalist parties presently on the scene – though I endeavour to maintain friendly relations with some of the people in those parties on an individual basis.

There is but one hope for the salvation of Britain, and that is the BNP. We must all pull behind the BNP and help it to succeed. And we must also keep cool heads in a crisis, even if others are losing theirs (advice from Kipling). We are facing insidious enemies on many fronts. If we lose our heads, they will win!

The things they're saying

Transport is a shambles. Education is going backwards. The NHS shows no improvement. The asylum crisis is out of control. So what issue commands New Labour's energies?

You've guessed it: gay rights. One of the mysteries of the age is why a prime Minister who came to power promising to support marriage and the family – and doing neither – is obsessed by this subject.

LEADER ARTICLE
Daily Mail (1.7.03)

It's come to something when Downing Street has to issue an official statement declaring that the Prime Minister hasn't gone potty.

That was No. 10's extraordinary response to a hatchet-job in the left-wing New Statesman magazine by the Friends of Gordon Brown.

A psychiatrist was wheeled out to offer the opinion that Blair is a 'psychopath'.

That's a bit strong, even by the standards of this column. The proper response would have been to ignore it, not rise to the bait.

From the outside looking in, the whole world of politics seems to have been seized with madness. The end of the parliamentary session is a relief for them and us alike.

As I said last week, I don't begrudge Blair a holiday.

But instead of heading off to Barbados, he's thrown himself into an insane Carry On Abroad world tour which will take in seven cities in six days and cover 19,258 miles in 178 hours.

Blair is behaving like Phileas Fogg on acid.

The Animal Farm school of television was founded in 1984, the year in which Terry Wogan opined that the medium shrinks the imagination, and decades after a long forgotten literary guru had damned it for making the manufacture of banality a major industry. The School is a mind-bending, brainwashing, indoctrinating institution devoted to training dim-witted but ambitious adolescents in the art of television.

Dimwitted the students must be, for no lively mind capable of bringing what he is taught to the bar of his own judgement would tolerate the dumbing discipline for longer than a term.

And an art television must claim to be, for art is superior and inviolable, and from the conviction that he is an artist will come the student's arrogance – necessary to ride roughshod over everyone who might plead for intellectual rigour in his work. Here, as I have painfully discovered, he learns by rote

... another comical war of words is raging in England. The evangelicals have taken Canon John's decision to decline the Bishopric of Reading with quiet satisfaction; the liberals, as they are called, with screams of hysterical fury. Dr. Harries, the liberal Bishop of Oxford, is said to be 'gutted'. Another key figure in this strange conflict, the Dean of Southwark, the Very Rev. Colin Slee, says that Canon John has been the victim of "appalling prejudice"; his withdrawal is a "devastating blow to hopes of progress and inclusiveness."

He has even claimed that it will lead to more empty pews in the churches, pews even emptier, in fact, than they are already. Is this likely? It is, of course, an accepted belief, accepted in the 'media' at any rate, that what would not long ago have been taken for granted, the aversion most people feel for deviant sexual practices, has now disappeared except among a few despised and backward people generally condemned as 'bigots', if not 'Tory backwoodsmen' and 'neo-nazis'.

The tragic deaths of so many British soldiers in Iraq yesterday will once again raise the question: why did we go to war against Iraq in the first place?

... We should declare a date within two years when we will withdraw all forces. Such a declaration would force the Iraqis to settle their own internal differences and stop sitting on the fence with regard to the Americans.

Nor should we dictate to the Iraqis what sort of constitutional arrangements they should put in place or who should be their future leaders.

That is up to them to decide. We should limit our involvement to providing basic security, and economic assistance to help rebuild the country.

At the end of the day history will decide whether we were led into war by liars and lunatics. But at present, the outlook does not look too good.

I have developed a habit when confronted by letters to the editor in support of the Israeli Government to look at the signature to see if the writer has a Jewish name. If so, I tend not to read it.

Too few people in this modern world are prepared to declare an interest when it comes to this sort of thing. It would be enormously helpful, for example, if those clerics and journalists who have been defending Canon Jeffrey John, the so-called gay bishop, were to tell us whether they themselves are gay. Some do, but more don't.

The issue arises partly because, in both cases, these people are often accusing the other side of being prejudiced and biased – we are either homophobes or anti-Semites.

The other day, for example, the Canadian journalist Barbara Amiel wrote a long denunciation of the BBC in the Daily Telegraph accusing the Corporation of being anti-Israel in its Middle East coverage.

Many readers of the Daily Telegraph may have been impressed by her arguments, assuming her to be just another journalist or even, as she was recently described in another newspaper, an 'international affairs commentator'.

They might have been less impressed if the paper had told them that Barbara Amiel is not only Jewish but that her husband's company, in which she has an interest, owns not only the Daily Telegraph but the Jerusalem Post.

Now I don't know about everyone else... but I find this rhetoric terrifying and faintly comical, the verbal equivalent of erecting exceedingly large monuments to your own intrinsic rightness. Worse, it is not a one-off. In 1998, arriving for peace talks in Northern Ireland, Blair said: "I feel the hand of history on our shoulders."

CONSPIRACY UNVEILED!

THE CONSPIRACY THEORY is something that should not be entrusted to immature minds. Like a potentially lethal scientific formula, when not understood properly it can lead people along crazy and sometimes even self-destructive paths. I first made acquaintance with the theory when in my mid-twenties, and fairly soon discovered that it was the pet hobbyhorse of all manner of cranks, paranoiacs, obsessionists and plain 'losers', who employed it to explain just about everything of which they disapproved, including their own personal misfortunes and frustrations. Introduced by these kinds of people into political debate, it was a gift to their opponents; and it tended to discourage all serious enquiry into the subject to which it related.

But serious enquiry was nevertheless called for. As a young man trying to make sense of certain political developments, I simply found that the conventional explanations of them did not fit. I soon became convinced that I was being lied to, along with millions of others, on an enormous scale. The agencies of the lies were the press, the film industry, the world of publishing and a large portion of the political class of all parties.

The lies, though diverse in nature, seemed all to follow a common direction: they pointed to, and endeavoured to justify, a path in British affairs which I considered suicidal. Nearly four and a half decades on from that time, everything that has happened in the intervening period confirms this belief.

Lies

I believed that we were being lied to about World War II, about Communism, about Race and Immigration, about the retreat of Britain from Empire and about matters which bore on the health of the national economy and British society. I believed that our country was being assailed by internal enemies on a multitude of fronts, and that these internal enemies presented a far greater threat to our survival as a nation than any external one, whether real or imagined.

An internal enemy must, of necessity, work in the manner of a spy; his operations have to be conducted in secret. When the element of secrecy pervades actions of great and serious consequence, a conspiracy has to be at work. The questions were: What was the nature of this conspiracy? In what ways did it function? What was its ultimate objective? And who were the conspirators?

The first two of these questions seemed to be answered, at least in large part. The conspiracy was gravely damaging Britain, eating away at all its essential sources of life and strength. It was functioning through the agencies I have mentioned – to which I was soon able to add television. As to the third and fourth questions, before definite conclusions could be reached more study and observation would be necessary. It was around this time that I first began to acquire and read literature dealing with the conspiracy theory.

Allowing for the eccentric element in much of these writings, there were certain common themes. One was that the conspiratorial forces were not just British but global, that although Britain was undoubtedly one of their major victims their activities targeted all free and sovereign nations, in particular the world's leading powers. Their strategy was directed at a world government, under which nations as we had known them would not be permitted to exist.

This theory immediately had a certain credibility in my eyes because so much of what I had observed on the British scene confirmed the view that the destruction of our nationhood was a major objective.

As to who the conspirators were, the literature was not unanimous. Nevertheless, in very large part it endorsed the theory that they were, at the very highest level, Jewish. The conspiracy was, in essence, a Jewish one, albeit that it employed many thousands of non-Jewish functionaries at subordinate levels throughout its network – an obviously visible truth, as could be ascertained by just a cursory look at the legions of politicians, political activists, scribblers and broadcasters who were not of that tribe.

This latter fact made me hesitate in accepting the view that the conspiracy, if it actually did exist, was a Jewish one. Jews were certainly prominent in many of the anti-national and internationalist tendencies that I could see in British life, but so also were great numbers of non-Jews. Were certain people who perhaps had their own reasons for grudges against the Jews making them scapegoats for evils for which responsibility was much more widely spread?

Endorsement and doubts conflicted with each other in my mind, and these thoughts were later related in my book The Eleventh Hour:-

"At first sight, the conspiracy theory is something that imposes a considerable strain on one's powers of digestion. Small plots involving very limited numbers of people are easy enough to believe in. But something as gigantic in scope as a conspiracy to direct the major events of a whole epoch of world history, involving the major decisions of the leading nations and enlisting, as such a thing must do, the participation of vast numbers of agents – that stretches human credulity to the utmost. And was with considerable scepticism that I first undertook a study of this topic.

"Nevertheless, against this cautionary thought was a counter-thought: if this theory of conspiracy was entirely groundless, the invention of paranoiacs and cranks, by what other means were certain important events to be explained?"

Conspiracy a reality

To cut a long story short, in due course I came to believe beyond any question of doubt that the element of conspiracy did exist in the affairs of the modern world, in that there definitely were certain currents driving the nations away from their traditional national loyalties and towards a one-world order; that these currents were being directed by forces of immense power – political, financial and psychological; and, not least, that they were undoubtedly using methods of secrecy for much of the time, concealing their ultimate purposes behind high-sounding rhetoric clearly intended to lull to sleep the broad mass of people whose passive acceptance would be needed if their plans were to come to fruition.

Just occasionally, of course, one of the conspiracy's agents would inadvertently let the cat out of the bag, such as when the Director of Studies at Chatham House, Professor Arnold Toynbee, told an international conference that he and they...

The once-secret machinations of the globalist élites, says JOHN TYNDALL, are now coming out into the open

"... are engaged in removing the instrument of sovereignty from the hands of the local nation states, while we are in fact denying with our lips what we are doing with our hands."

Was the conspiracy Jewish or was it not? A simple yes or no to that question is far from easy because the question is infinitely more complex. Just to take one example, one of the most powerful bodies with a hand in today's drive towards One World is the Bilderberg Society, which regularly holds conferences at various locations around the globe which are cloaked in secrecy, with stringent security precautions taken on all

Because these machinations are far removed from the public eye – as is almost all else the Bilderbergers do – we just have no way of knowing.

Unifying bond

But there was one thing which, many years ago, led me to give credence to the theory of the one-world conspiracy being Jewish-inspired at the very topmost level. In any conspiracy of the nature of the one we are examining, there just has to be some unifying bond bringing together those who comprise its main motivators and wire-pullers. Mere common belief in a future ordering of the world does not seem enough – particularly when it is borne in mind that the way of career advancement and financial reward.

Writing in The Eleventh Hour in 1988 (repeated again in the later edition published in 1998), I said:-

"As to the final question, that of whether the ultimate directing power behind such forces is Jewish, I do not find a case as yet proven but I certainly do find that there is a case to answer; and not the least of the factors that influence me in this direction is the frantic reluctance of the leaders of Jewry to have that case examined in the open. Precisely to what degree the conspiracy is Jewish-controlled I leave to the reader to decide after a comprehensive study of this and other evidence on the subject."

Herein lies a very strong pointer in the search for truth; for never in all the time that I have taken an interest in the issue of conspiratorial politics has there been allowed, at least in this country, a proper public enquiry, conducted according to traditional British legal procedure, as to whether: (1) there is a conspiracy directed to One World or not; and (2) in the event of such a conspiracy being proved, there is a definite Jewish role in it.

'Anti-semitism' cry

To raise these matters will, I know, invite the usual tirades about 'anti-semitism' – always the reaction of Jews and their supporters whenever they appear. This orchestrated howl of 'anti-semitism' is, of course, no proper substitute for argument – though it usually suffices to put an end to all argument, such is the terror of the multitude of politicians, journalists, newspaper-owners and broadcasters when the issue raises its head.

Why then is there this reluctance to submit the matter to open enquiry? One of the very best observations on this subject was made in an article that appeared on the Internet last year, where the writer said:-

"After the war (World War II), in order to be innocent of 'anti-semitism', one should not even notice Jews. That is why an open, no-holds-barred debate on the real extent of Jewish power would not be an easy one, as it is notoriously hard to measure and prove influence, and no newspaper or TV network in the western world would touch it with a bargepole."

And the author of these words? Actually it was Israel Shamir, an Israeli journalist who has displayed immense courage in writing frankly and honestly, again and again, about the misdeeds of his kinfolk – particularly in the context of the war in Palestine. Shamir is a living, walking and talking rebuttal of the idea that to demand an open enquiry about Jewish power is to be guilty of 'anti-semitism' – that is, to be against Jews just because they are Jews. Here we have a occasions, to which the press are never invited and the minutes of which are never publicly revealed. What is regularly revealed, however, is the list of attendees, who are always present on invitation only. This list does at least indicate two things. One is that many such attendees are not 'world figures' at the time they attend but later become such by way of some mysterious process that elevates them from relative obscurity to high office in a short time. Tony Blair, for instance, was a guest in 1993 – before he became Labour leader. Margaret Thatcher attended in 1975, the same year in which she became head of the Tory Party but some time before she was prime minister. Bill Clinton was present at the 1991 conference, and a short time afterwards became President of the United States.

The other thing any Bilderberg list reveals is that the attendees come from a mixture of national and ethnic backgrounds, some Jewish but the majority not. This does not mean, of course, that the Jewish minority does not have a decisive hand in the shaping of policy and in the machinations whereby there is an advancement in the careers of those people whom the Bilderbergers have vetted and given the seal of their approval.

many of the practices by which this particular conspiracy has advanced towards its goals have been in direct contradiction to the professed ideals of 'peace' and 'brotherhood' that are supposed to underlie its philosophy. As in the prosecution of World War II, the dispossession of the White Man in Africa, the dragooning of the nations into European Union, right up to the recent invasion and conquest of Iraq, methods of the utmost ruthlessness – while at the same time contrary to all the supposed principles of 'democracy' – have been employed without compunction. It has always seemed to me that a diverse group of people, moreover people largely moved by 'liberal' convictions, could never themselves coalesce towards such an objective when it involved endorsement of actions wholly out of keeping with the European and Euro-American traditions of civilisation.

That is, unless such people were merely the non-commissioned officers in the army of world conquest – doing no more than following orders set by an agenda decided well above their heads and by people with a wholly different ethos and mindset; non-commissioned officers, furthermore, who had been provided with ample inducement in Jewish writer acknowledging the source of the fear of the media of such an enquiry. Actually, Shamir's particular line is that it is the perception of Jewish power, rather than the actual extent of it, which paralyses debate on any subject pertaining to Jews unless the ordained conclusion is that the latter will come out smelling of roses. But whether it is the perception or the reality, it leads us to the same conclusion: that free discussion of the subject in our supposed 'democracies' is just not allowed.

But in some other instances more than mere perceptions apply. In a recent news item from Australia it was reported that Jewish groups in that country went to court demanding an injunction to prevent the showing of a new film about the author David Irving which highlights the Jewish community's behind-the-scenes scheming to deny him entry into the country in 1993. As it turned out, the court refused the injunction – very good news, as long as it lasts, for we do not know whether new pressures will achieve an overturning of this verdict. But the story suffices to illustrate just how frantically, and with what determination, certain elements within the Jewish community will campaign to suppress public exposure of their activities. They would not be bothering to do so now had they not had ample evidence that their past efforts to the same purpose had succeeded.

TV whitewash

A year or two ago, there was shown on late-night TV in Britain a documentary on The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the famous book which surfaced around the turn of the century purporting to consist of a series of lectures by an eminent 'insider' Jew on how his race would achieve world dominion. As soon as the screening of this programme was announced, its outcome was a foregone conclusion: it would contain abundant evidence that The Protocols was a forgery, without any counter-evidence even being given a hearing. Those brought onto the programme to give their views would either be Jews or pro-Jewish Gentiles, and they would all sing from the same songsheet. And so it proved. There simply was no discussion of the truth or falsehood of The Protocols at all, merely various people supplying affirmation that they simply had to be false!

Actually, the question of whether The Protocols were a forgery or not is not central to the issue. Speaking for myself, I am inclined to believe that the document was forged, as its contents were simply too explicit to sound credible; just supposing that such lectures ever took place, the lecturer would have put across his message in a much more roundabout, ambiguous and subtle fashion than is shown in the book as it exists.

THE PROTOCOLS

The main point is that the workings of Jewry were described in the book as someone observed them in the 1890s, when the papers on which it was based first appeared in France and were thought to be the work of a Catholic priest. Anyone reading the book will immediately be struck by the uncanny resemblance between the events described therein and what can be seen happening in this year of 2003. And that, of course, is the real point at issue. Needless to say, discussion of any of this in the TV programme was wholly absent.

It is an elementary rule of police investigation that when a suspect is evasive under questioning it points to likely guilt rather than likely innocence. To say that certain Jewish interests today are evasive when the machinations of Jewish power are questioned is to understate the case twenty times over; they have indicated that they are absolutely determined that no such questioning on a public level will ever be allowed. And to date, the evidence is that they have succeeded in just that objective.

New world situation

But events have moved on, and today we live in a wholly new world. Let me elaborate.

The more I studied the conspiracy theory and its concomitant theme of Jewish involvement, the more I became struck by one overwhelming central thought. As the conspiracy advanced towards the fulfilment of its objectives, the more inevitably and glaringly it would be bound to expose itself. In addition, the more confident its practitioners became of their omnipotence and their ability to direct world events in any way they chose, the more it would become likely that hubris would take over and induce them to overplay their hands – with the result that matters which in the past had been successfully shrouded in secrecy would be revealed in the open for millions to see. Even those lacking in political sophistication, and not disposed anyway to study obscure designs which did not seem to affect them personally, would be jolted into awareness when these designs became so blatant that they hit the general public in the eye with the impetus of a thunderbolt.

And another, related, thought was that the complicity of armies of newspaper editors and journalists, TV programme-makers and politicians in those same designs could not be ensured for ever. There would come a time when the fruits of the conspirators' work would impact so spectacularly and painfully on the world, and particularly on the West – always the chief target of all their destructive plans, that no 'cover-up' of them could any longer be an option. There would be a massive public awakening, and the media, out of the necessities of credibility and survival, would have to address the issues and deal with them. The world of journalism, reporting and punditry would be populated by people who had grandstand seats at the outrageous events that would be occurring. Could they be relied upon indefinitely not ever to discuss them, whether amongst themselves or with their reading and viewing publics? My conclusions years ago were that they could not. I do not claim any special prescience in this; thousands of others who took their politics seriously must have had the same thoughts.

Lid off the box

In three vital areas, these things have now come to pass, and the lid has well and truly come off the Pandora's Box of conspiracy, subversion and criminal politics. They are: Immigration; European Union; and the War Against Iraq.

Of the first two, not a great deal needs to be said. When I first became involved in active politics immigration impacted in only a small way, on very few people and in a limited number of areas in particular major cities. If one said a word of criticism of it, one was damned as a 'race-hater', one of the forerunners of the term 'racist'. Political parties which partook in this criticism were deemed 'odd' and confined to the despised fringe.

And in the meantime the 'Europe' idea was just in its infancy and was thought by almost everyone to be quite harmless. The 'Common Market' had an appeal to many people with still fresh memories of a world war who were easily seduced by talk of 'peace' and 'co-operation' between Britain and her neighbours, and who also liked the idea of British exports enjoying a boom on the Continent, without so much as a thought for Continental exports coming into Britain and putting our own producers out of business.

Any talk of immigration being part of a conspiracy to destroy the British Nation, or of 'Europe' becoming a super-state in which our sovereignty and freedom would be destroyed, met with little interest. It was all just 'alarmism' – the preoccupation of a few 'extremists' and prophets of doom.

This was the situation some forty years ago. The reader will not need persuading as to how radically and drastically it has changed. What a tiny élite was conspiring towards then is now out in the open. Great numbers of people are talking about it, whether it be the conspiracy to ensnare Britain in a federated Europe or the conspiracy to flood this country with immigrants – to the point at which, some time in the second half of the present century, they will have taken it over and native Britons will be a minority!

Consequences of Iraq war

But it is over the issue of the war against Iraq that conspiratorial politics have suffered their most damning exposure. Millions have seen that their Government has lied to them in order to embroil Britain in a war that makes not the slightest sense from any standpoint of British defence, security or national interest, and through which 43 British lives have been lost already and countless more of such lives may be lost in a future which appears to have no end.

Of course, our politicians have been lying to us for at least sixty years – and some of them before that. But in the past there has not been more than the tiniest perception that they were lying – and, perhaps most importantly, the media have given us no more than the tiniest glimmer of a sign that they were lying. But now the lies of the Prime Minister and his Government are the national talking point of the day, with a firm majority (at the last count 64 per cent) believing that they are not to be trusted.

What has become unravelled over the past few months is a plan, determined upon by the US Government, to invade and occupy Iraq and depose its leader Saddam Hussein – for reasons which had nothing remotely to do with the security of the United States or the defence of its vital interests. This plan has involved an act of outright military aggression – directly contrary to all the principles that are supposed to have underpinned western politics and morality since German leaders were hanged at Nuremberg in 1946 allegedly for just the same thing. To sanction this action, President Bush produced doctored 'evidence' that Saddam had possession of weapons of mass-destruction which made him a threat to world peace. He was backed up by our own Tony Blair, ever the Americans' lackey, who claimed to have his own dossiers justifying the same allegation.

All this 'evidence' is now being thoroughly demolished in a series of public enquiries which point to a truth which should have been clear from the outset: that the claim as to Saddam Hussein's intentions was so preposterous that no intelligent person would have given it five minutes' consideration. The act of aggression against Iraq was determined upon for reasons in no way related to the public protestations of those who led it and supported it. Just what those reasons were we may now examine.

One supposed reason that has had a prominent airing, and is particularly favoured on the political left, is that it was all about oil. America, with its own domestic oil reserves running out, needed secure overseas supplies to supplement them. This has never seemed to me a plausible argument for war.

Another, much more probable, reason is of course America's commitment to guarantee the security of Israel, and the agitation of the hugely powerful Jewish lobby in Washington that the toppling of Saddam Hussein in nearby Iraq was necessary to this.

But even this presumed casus belli seems inadequate on its own. To get a picture of the wider scenario, and to see matters in terms of global politics, we would do well to examine

STRAUSS
He held that 'democracy' should be imposed on the whole world – if necessary by force, his disciples believe.

an article, penned by Sarah Baxter, which appeared in The Guardian on May 11th this year. This focused on a hitherto scarcely known personage who was described as the "guru of the US warrior classes." The man under examination was one Leo Strauss, and the article's revelations about him were startling – startling, that is, as an item to be found in a mainstream newspaper. Said the Guardian article:-

"An obscure philosopher and classicist is emerging as one of the most conservative influences of the early 21st century. Political scientists are dusting off the works of Leo Strauss, who died in America in 1973 and left behind a band of disciples who are shaping the Pentagon's muscular foreign policy.

"Strauss was a Jewish émigré from Nazi Germany who set off for England carrying a copy of his manuscript on Thomas Hobbes, the 17th century British political philosopher...

"He spent part of the 1930s in the intellectual ferment of Cambridge University and debated with the leading socialists of the day, such as Harold Laski and R.H. Tawney."

The intellectual ferment of which the writer was speaking was of course that of the network of liberal internationalists with no loyalties to their own countries which spawned traitors like Burgess, Maclean and Blunt. From what the article goes on to say about Strauss, it becomes clear that he would have fitted very well into that environment. Miss Baxter went on to explain the link between Strauss and today's Middle East hawks in the United States, rather misleadingly labelled 'neo-conservatives', and she spoke of one leading 'neo-con', William Kristol, a man known as part of what is sometimes called President Bush's 'Kosher Mafia', as being very much of a Strauss disciple. She quoted Kristol on his mentor:-

" 'One can be a hawk in foreign policy without having read Leo Strauss but he was an immensely powerful teacher and thinker... There's a hard-headedness and tough-mindedness to him but he also had an elevated view of what politics could accomplish.' "

"The emergence of Strauss as an important influence is the more surprising because he did not write about foreign policy, though his experience of the Holocaust convinced him that 'to make the world safe for the western democracies one must make the whole globe democratic, each country in itself as well as the society of nations.' "

'Democracy', with or without consent

If the whole globe could not be made democratic by consent, it was clear from a reading of the Strauss doctrine, it would have to be made so by force. The United States was not only the ideal, but indeed the only, instrument by which in modern times that could be done. Hence the justification of the 'muscular foreign policy' of which the deliberate attack on Iraq was merely a symptom and probably just only the start.

In other words, it must not be left to individual nations to decide what kind of political systems suited them; such decisions must be made for them by self-appointed western élites, who knew best. The contradictions in all this are obvious to the simplest observer. To ensure the 'democratisation' of the whole world, methods must, if necessary, be used which are the very negation of all that is supposed to be meant by democracy.

CONSPIRACY UNVEILED!

Countries may be subjected to armed attack and military conquest, thereupon to have governments and régimes, no matter how alien, imposed upon them without even a suggestion of their people's consent. This, of course, is precisely what has happened to Iraq. The question is: To whom is it going to happen next? And from this comes a further question: Just at what point does the process end?

But of course all this talk about 'democracy' and the 'democratisation' of the world is just code. Such buzzwords are merely camouflage for very different ends. What do Strauss, Kristol and a whole army of other 'neo-cons' clustered around President Bush have in common? Not sure? Then include Paul Wolfowitz, US Deputy Secretary for Defence, Abram Shulsky, Director of the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans, Ari Fleischer, White House spokesman, and Richard Perle, head of the Pentagon defence policy board. Are we getting warm? Does the reader really require me to continue?

Better than that, let me quote from an item in The Economist, an impeccable 'establishment' journal, which appeared in March this year:-

"Gradually, people from the left and right are beginning to allege in public what some moderates whisper privately: that war against Iraq has been promoted by a cabal of Jewish hardliners who are more concerned with protecting Israel than they are with advancing America's national interest."

Could such a piece have actually appeared in a publication like The Economist? Apparently it could. And it did! And that just goes to show, again, how certain things are coming out into the open which not long ago would have been tightly censored and suppressed. And that is not all. In no less a newspaper than the New York Times, columnist Maureen Dowd wrote the following last October:-

"Influential Jewish conservatives inside and outside the administration have been fierce in supporting a war on Saddam, thinking it could help Israel by scrambling the Middle East map and encouraging democracy."

Doctrine for the globe

But are the welfare and security of Israel the only consideration? Let us remind ourselves of the Strauss doctrine: that the whole globe must become 'democratic'. When this matter is seen in context, are we really talking about 'democracy' or are we talking about Jewish control? Considering, as we have seen, that decidedly 'undemocratic' means apparently have to be employed to achieve this objective, it seems not unreasonable to point to the latter. In other words, so-called 'democracy' looks very much just a misleading euphemism for a Zionist World Order in which the people who own so much of the press and television and nearly all of the film industry, and who clearly can 'buy' the politicians, will pull the strings behind a mere facade of parliamentary institutions – which, as demonstrated, must be imposed upon those nations who might not wish to embrace them!

The formula seems blindingly simple. The United States, because of its economic and military power, must be granted world hegemony. As Jews effectively control the American media and the American Government, this hegemony would in fact be a Jewish hegemony – under which ordinary Americans would be as much serfs as the people of other nations. This was what was predicted in The Protocols more than a century ago. Whether the document was a forgery or not, that seems to have been a mighty shrewd prediction!

But when The Protocols first surfaced all this was largely concealed from the broad mass of the people in all the countries of the world; it was only observed and understood by a small minority of the politically conscious. Now it is being enacted in a way that millions can see and recognise. We are witnessing a gigantic conspiracy being unveiled – as seems always to have been inevitable because of the immense scale and scope of its ambitions. The ramifications of this are so tremendous that even those of us who take great care to watch and think, who like to believe themselves informed about the currents of national and international politics, probably have yet to grasp the full meaning of what it all portends.

Truly it might be said that we live in interesting times!

De-mythologising Private Lynch

LORD PONSONY once famously said that when nations go to war the first casualty is truth. We were reminded of this last month when it was revealed that the hysterically hyped-up (or perhaps we should nowadays say 'sexed-up') story of the rescue of US Army Private Jessica Lynch from the clutches of those diabolical Iraqis was fiction from start to finish.

At a time when President Bush and his poodle Tony Blair were facing mounting criticism over the Iraq war, the Americans decided they needed a national 'hero' on whom to focus patriotic feeling and distract the masses from their growing concern about the political advisability of the conflict. A small war incident was seized upon and the Washington lie-factory went into overdrive.

The world read that Private Lynch, a 19-year-old army clerk from West Virginia, was captured when her unit took a wrong turning just outside Nasiriya and was ambushed. The story went on to say that Jessica was engaged in a pitched battle with Iraqis, in which she emptied her revolvers at them until she was shot and stabbed. Just barely alive, she was dragged off to be tortured.

Then, in true Hollywood US-Cavalry fashion, American special forces were supposed to have made a daring raid on Private Lynch's place of captivity and whisked her away to freedom!

Sounds dramatic. The trouble was

PHONEY STORY
This is the front page of Newsweek magazine, reporting the allegedly daring operation to rescue Jessica from Saddam's 'torturers' that none of this happened.

Caught with their pants down due to the testimony of witnesses, the war propagandists of the Pentagon later admitted that there was no shoot-out. Jessica wasn't wounded in any battle but sustained her injuries when her vehicle crashed. Far from being tortured, she was extremely well cared for in a nearby hospital where Iraqi doctors provided her with the best treatment available, and possibly saved her life.

A Daily Mail leader had it well summed up. Commenting on the big public fib, it said: "There, in a nutshell, is why politics and politicians are so distrusted and despised."

One thing more might be said. This particular war propaganda lie was exposed. How many others, dating back a long way in time, have yet to feel the spotlight of truth? Now that is a really interesting question!

VOCABULARY FOR THE POLITICALLY AWARE

Nationalist

Synonym for patriot. Supporter of the nation-state founded on racial integrity, a common culture, historic achievement, and occupation of the same homeland for centuries. One who is invariably loyal to his ancestry, kinfolk and native country.

Nation-State

An authentic nation-state incorporates certain basic features:-

- At least 90 per cent common racial ancestry.
- A common language (which does not exclude retention of some subsidiary ancestral languages like Gaelic).
- A shared culture in terms of racial literature, art, music, religion, science and technology.
- A highly-developed legislative and judicial system, including trial by jury, sensible rules of evidence and an independent judiciary.

Many of the so-called 'nations' set up during the present century (and particularly since 1945) must be regarded as synthetic and inherently non-viable. They are the product of political expediency and fashionable ideology of the egalitarian variety. Much, if not most, of the present international instability and conflict is a direct consequence of imposing an arbitrary and synthetic 'nationhood' on fundamentally disparate and incompatible populations; examples include African 'states', India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, the USSR, most of Latin-America, Indonesia, Israel, Lebanon, Yugoslavia and some Arab republics. Many of these are also economically non-viable and remain 'independent' only in name, subsisting largely on Western charity.

'Negotiated Settlement'

The present government's term for protracted surrender to IRA terrorism. There can, of course, be no 'settlement' to detach Ulster from the United Kingdom and transfer it to the Irish Republic. The mere fact that the government is negotiating at all gives the IRA a coded message to the effect that, as and when it is politically expedient, Ulster will be betrayed. The Irish government has nothing to offer Ulster except renunciation of its spurious claim on that part of Ireland. British Nationalists will support their Ulster compatriots in preserving the territorial integrity of the UK by any means necessary.

Negrophilia

An extreme form of liberalism whereby negroes are absurdly over-indulged. Typical examples occur frequently in the mass media, publishing and entertainment worlds. Negrophilia finds its most extreme expression in miscegenation.

However, what sometimes passes for negrophilia is often the product of minds entirely lacking in any regard for black people but interested only in using their supposed 'grievances' for political purposes.

Parasite

There are only three kinds of relationship between different species:-

- (i) Symbiotic, i.e. mutually beneficial.
- (ii) Predator-Prey, the former always subsisting at the latter's expense.
- (iii) Host-Parasite, the latter subsisting always at the former's expense.

A parasitic organism subsists wholly or mainly by attaching itself to a higher organism – without contributing anything which the host organism could not otherwise obtain from its own resources. The essence of the matter is that the parasite itself would cease to exist, or would suffer a greatly reduced quality of life, if separated from the unwitting/unwilling host, whereas the host does not need the parasite, and usually suffers more or less severely from its attachment, even to the point of its own premature extinction.

In the context of human evolution, some races have proved incapable of self-advancement beyond the bare subsistence level; consequently, they can only improve their lives by attaching themselves – i.e. becoming parasitical upon – more successful and resourceful races.

From the evolutionary standpoint, it is therefore accurate to describe some races as parasitical upon others. In the long term this tendency could well reach a point at which the host race is crippled by its parasites and the entire evolutionary process is put in jeopardy.

Passive Resistance

Means doing nothing at all to assist a bad government and everything short of criminal behaviour to get rid of it. It therefore represents the minimum response for anyone opposed to anti-British legislation.

'The People'

For the renegade politician the term 'people' simply means election-fodder, without regard to race, religion, language, education, family status, work record, service to the nation, etc. Whatever the subject under discussion, the acid test of any politician's credibility is his/her definition of 'the people' whose welfare is supposed to be the central concern. And anyone who fails to equate 'the British people' just with those of English, Welsh, Scots, Irish or kindred European ancestry has nothing to say worth listening to. So when you hear a politician refer to 'the people', simply ask: "What people?"

Political correctness

Derisive term for all attempts to re-write history, revise language and regulate behaviour in order to protect the self-esteem of racial and sexual minorities. Its most appropriate icon is the black lesbian dwarf wearing a crown.

Progress

This term is discredited when applied to fundamentally undesirable changes. Thus, for example, British power, influence and prosperity have actually regressed during the present century to an extent our ancestors would have deemed incredible; so politicians' talk of 'progress' is extremely suspect. Any country, like any individual, not actually gaining in power, influence, territory and other assets is not achieving progress.

Propaganda

Systematic measures to mislead the general public as to the true state of affairs, and to indoctrinate people with an inherently undesirable ideology. It relies upon ambiguity, half-truths, euphemism, censorship, ignorance, patronage, repetition and the 'media mafia', as well as downright lies. Thus, for example, all popular radio/TV programmes are loaded with 'political correctness' on subjects like multi-racialism, feminism, homosexuality, Gentile guilt, anti-nationalism and highly tendentious accounts of British history. Much the same applies to magazines and advertisements.

Proscription

Official outlawing of an organisation or faction. Jews, Blacks, Asians and liberals are always demanding proscription of the British Nationalist movement; but the problem for the Establishment is that, much as it would like to oblige, this would only create a dangerous 'underground' movement with very widespread popular support. Consequently, the Establishment resorts to more devious and indirect tactics to contain and frustrate the nationalist movement, for example:-

- The Race Relations and Public Order Acts.
- Legal and quasi-legal harassment of leading nationalists.
- Indulgence towards militant anti-nationalist organisations.
- Exclusion of nationalists and nationalist material from the mass media, libraries, booksellers, schools and colleges, all public and many private appointments.
- Prominent and generous support for multi-racial policies and activities in order to present nationalism as a 'lunatic fringe'.

These tactics seem to be working well enough so far to make legal proscription superfluous now or in the foreseeable future. Even so, proscription could still be the Establishment's last-resort tactic when the BNP attracts more and more popular support.

AT THE MOMENT there are 15 members of the European Union but by 2006 it is likely that the number will have grown to at least 25. Three of the present 15, Denmark, Sweden and the United Kingdom, have not yet adopted the single currency. Norway and Switzerland are the only Western European nations which retain their independence. Mr. Romano Prodi, president of the EU Commission has described the enlargement as a "political masterpiece." Among the countries due to join in 2004, it has been said of Poland that it lacks the means to control the billions of euros which will soon be raining down on its five million farmers. Latvia has been described as having serious problems with pre-trial detention, unsound police and judges, and a high level of corruption. Similar comments have been made about the Czech Republic, Hungary and Slovakia, all of whom are riddled with fraud and need to clean up their judicial systems. The good news is that some candidates, notably Estonia and Slovenia, can claim better records than Italy, a founder member of the Union!

Most EU countries are keeping controls on workers coming from Eastern Europe for up to seven years. Britain alone is giving all the 'new citizens' immediate rights to residence, employment and access to the welfare state. Note that unemployment benefit is £14 a week in Poland and £9.50 in Latvia. On the other hand, those with a really macabre sense of humour will be amused to learn that we British will soon be able to settle in Slovakia or Lithuania and claim benefits!

Valéry's constitution

When M. Valéry Giscard d'Estaing presented his final blueprint for the EU's first constitution he observed that: "The closer you stick to our text... then the lighter will be your task." Judiciously, that text refrained from mentioning the word 'federal' or a 'United States of Europe': omissions quickly seized upon by Peter Hain, the government's chief negotiator, who pointed out, somewhat ingenuously, that euro-sceptics now had nothing to worry about! When pressured on the need for a referendum, this same Mr. Hain opined that: "Treaty change is a matter for member-states to decide... in accordance with their own constitutional requirements. It is right that Parliament should decide on the results the Government achieves at inter-governmental conferences." Interestingly, Spain's foreign minister said of the text that: "It is not pure rhetoric, and puts an end to 19th century diplomacy where agreements were signed behind closed doors." So will the Spanish get a referendum?

Even the most diehard euro-sceptic would agree that a club of 25 members

Ten Weddings and our Funeral

Not ready for the euro but rushing into a new constitution: COLIN VERNON looks at the current state of play concerning Britain and the EU cannot function properly if any member can shove a spanner in the works by vetoing a proposal supported by the majority. So, naturally enough, the draft constitution takes us a long way down the road towards qualified majority voting in all matters of EU policy-making. Yet we read that Tony Blair thinks – or says he thinks – that national governments should retain control over foreign policy, running the economy, taxation and social security, and that there should not be a European Public Prosecutor. It looks as though the Government is in for a rough ride when the inter-governmental conference considers the new constitution in October, with a view to agreeing a finalised draft in the late spring of next year. Can we therefore look forward to a carefully worded fudge where, as a sop, Blair gets his own way over majority-voting on the asylum-seeker question but gives ground everywhere else? After all, he needs to show that he is a good European so, at the end of the day, he will probably settle for a hotchpotch compromise which will be hailed as a victory but which won't stand up when you look at the small print.

Come and join us, says Tony

When it comes to sheer hypocrisy our Government stands out in a crowd. As mentioned above, it pretends to want to keep control over the economy, and yet wants Britain to embrace the euro at the earliest opportunity, knowing full well that these aims are incompatible. With the cheek of the devil, the Prime Minister has laid down the gauntlet and is saying: "You are either with me or against me. Either you welcome the single currency, or you are one of those incorrigibles who would prefer to be out of the EU and missing all the benefits its members enjoy." His ploy is, of course, to make things difficult for the Tories, who cling to a strange belief that it is fine to be in Europe but not too far in. For the moment, the IDS faction is saying that it does not want the euro, and would like to halt the 'EU Steamroller'. It foresees "a democratic revolution and the return of power to the nation states." Exactly how it will push this boulder uphill is not properly explained. On the other hand, the Clarke faction is more or less ready to canonise Mr. Prodi whenever an opportunity presents itself. Duncan-Smith is playing to the gallery while his party remains fundamentally split.

Oddly enough, in a sense, Mr. Blair has got it right. As long as we hang about on the periphery, with what might be described as honorary membership, we are getting the worst of both worlds. However, his challenge, while it may discomfort the shadow cabinet, is music to the ears of all true believers in freedom. It opens up the debate and allows us to focus on the fundamentals – a route the Tories do not have the courage to take.

Not never but not now

The famous tests of convergence were designed, we are told, to ensure that the UK economy will be able to slip more or less painlessly into the euro straitjacket on the day that we join the single currency. All this is, of course, a preposterous hoax intended to convey the impression that a decision will be taken on purely economic criteria, when in fact it will be an overtly political move – the ultimate treachery.

GISCARD D'ESTAING
Deciding our future?

Unluckily for the government, the Treasury took its task seriously and, for what it is worth, just one test has been 'satisfied', which is that the City is ready for the euro and will not suffer when Britain takes the plunge. Funnily enough, the word in the City is that "we'll always out-gun the other financial centres even if we keep the pound."

Getting us organised

A clearly disappointed Prime Minister has ordered his Chancellor of the Exchequer to do all he can to speed things up so as to facilitate our embracing the euro as soon as possible. Because 'boom and bust' has been, often quite wrongly I believe, blamed on the volatility of the housing market, we will now be encouraged to go for fixed-rate mortgages while, at the same time, planning restrictions, particularly in the South East, will be quietly dumped, so that Mr. Prescott can get on with his massive house-building programme designed to destroy what is left of our countryside. Next, it seems that we will be watching, albeit with a certain amount of amusement, the spectacle of a Labour government championing the idea of regional pay bargaining in the public sector. Can you imagine the reaction of Unison and all the rest when Brown suggests this? Also, from November, the Bank of England will be told to set interest rates to "hit a target for inflation based upon the EU's harmonised index of consumer prices." Whatever happened to the Bank's much vaunted freedom to set rates appropriate to our British economy? Finally, we have broad hints that there will be big tax-hikes to smooth Britain's path into the single currency.

What happens when we go in?

When you no longer have the power to set interest-rates (monetary control), then fine tuning by adjusting taxes (fiscal control) is the only remaining option. Some of you may just remember the Wilson Government's disastrous attempts to combat inflation by siphoning off excess purchasing power through tax increases, which resulted in afternoon tea and cakes in Downing Street, wage increases of up to 30 per cent, and of course higher inflation. Income tax, says the Treasury, could rise by 5p in the pound when we join up. However it is also said that inside the euro every one of us could be at least £50 a year better off, which is less than £1 a week. In a delightful piece of irony, one commentator observed that: "Never before in history has a government been brave enough to express national sovereignty in terms of a simple cash value."

In fact, it is certain that radical new taxes will be needed, including a property tax (that means an annual tax on your own home) plus capital-gains tax when you sell that home – as well as variable VAT, and the revival of so-called economic regulators which would allow the Chancellor to alter the duty on petrol, tobacco and alcohol between budgets. As one expert put it, "The idea that tax rates should be used actively to manage spending power has been out of fashion for three decades, but Mr. Brown is willing to put the clock back." Effectively, we will have embarked on a merry-go-round to hell and we will get nothing out of it.

The State of the Union

A couple of years ago, as a gesture of goodwill, I set aside a transparent plastic folder intended to house clippings and comment in any way favourable to the EU and its enterprises. Predictably, as I contemplate the front cover, the whole of the back cover is still clearly visible.

They have just re-written the Common Agricultural Policy, which will still cost £30 billions a year and in which the main beneficiaries are still France, Spain and Greece. It costs the average British family of four £16 a week in taxes and unnecessarily inflated prices. Every EU cow gets more than £1.30 a day in subsidies. There are 1.1 billion people in the world living on half that much.

When Jacques Santer's disgraced Commission departed, under protest, in 1999, we were told that this was the end of fraud scandals. Things would be different. Just watch and see! So we watched, and just three weeks ago the director general of Eurostat (that's the Commission's own statistical agency) and two of his deputies, were moved to advisory non-management posts pending an investigation into serious allegations of malpractice. But this time we are not talking about dodgy numbers for olive production, or disappearing Charolais bulls, but about an important arm of the Commission with an office in Luxembourg employing 760 people. And this sort of scandal will go on; not just because the EU is a happy hunting ground for crooks, but also because there is nobody there with the brain or the guts to sort it out.

Our scientists are warning that idiotic EU rules on clinical trials will cost lives. The Government has set up a joint task force with medical charities and the Medical Research Council to consider how these barmy directives can be implemented to do the least possible damage.

The EU Commission plans for new consumer credit laws fail both lenders and consumers, says Bristol University's Personal Finance Research Centre. Consumers will have inadequate protection while credit providers will be strangled in unnecessary red tape.

The true cost of this useless monolithic structure may never be known, and the catalogue of its mistakes, misdeeds and misconceptions would undoubtedly fill thousands of pages. The plain fact is, we don't need it!

It's between us and them

By us, I mean the BNP, and today more than 60 per cent of our folk would back us and vote 'no' to joining a single currency, with only a brainwashed 30 per cent, at the very most, prepared to say 'yes'. The shallow, wavering, vacillating UKIP has no place in this battle. And those battle lines are being drawn. Labour's advertising agency has been instructed to play on public fears about Britain remaining outside the euro. We will be told the grotesque lie (see my comments above) that our families will lose out as the rest of Europe gets richer (ask the Germans about that one). Joining the euro will be portrayed as a patriotic move. The world, we will be told, is coalescing into groups and it is thus counter-intuitive for Britain to be off on its own. Their world maybe, but not ours, because we will be free! Only one political party stands wholeheartedly prepared to defend our British freedom, and has, hopefully, already drafted that historic letter informing the eurocrats in Brussels that we have had more than enough of them. We deserve your support and so do your children!

THE POUND
Make no mistake, the politicians are resolved on surrendering it just as soon as they think they can get away with it.

A NEW PERSPECTIVE ON 'ANTI-SEMITISM'

MANY of us realise that we live in an absurd age, and one of the most absurd media events of last month was that of Peter Mandelson's pal David Aaronovitch (like Mandelson, a former Communist, now turned New Labourite) being given ample TV time and pages of broadsheet space in order to attack Arabs for being 'anti-Semites'. Even though some of the poor Arabs he berated were living in Palestine under almost perpetual Israeli bombardment, they were the villains of the piece!

Underlying all of Aaronovitch's arguments was an exceptionally ethnocentric world view. To him, it would seem that Gentiles don't really exist at all except as irrational haters of his people, either actively menacing or at best passively hostile. Fortunately, in gaining an understanding of how such strange views came into being – and how they now dominate the world of media and politics – we can go to the works of Kevin MacDonald.

Kevin MacDonald has an academic post as Professor of Psychology at California State University. His special interest is in applying evolutionary psychology to gain a better understanding of the nature of ethnic conflicts and rivalries. Specifically, in his massive three-part magnum opus, he makes an exhaustive study of Jewish-Gentile relations throughout history. The books are: A People That Shall Dwell Alone, Separation and its Discontents and The Culture of Critique.

MacDonald's tone is – with the exception of some parts of The Culture of Critique – cool, neutral and detached. He brings out some facts that could hardly be described as 'anti-Semitic', such as the finding, given in A People That Shall Dwell Alone, that the average Ashkenazi Jewish IQ is a full 15 points higher than that of Caucasians.

EVOLUTIONARY STRATEGY

Fundamentally, MacDonald sees Judaism as a group evolutionary strategy, designed to aid competition against other groups. He points out that Judaism – with its extensive customs, priestly regulations and restrictions – enabled Jewish survival throughout many years scattered in the midst of other populations from ancient times onwards, a unique achievement matched by no other ethnic/religious group.

In MacDonald's words: "The Jews were the only ethnic group to survive intact after the upheavals that occurred at the end of antiquity. After the barbarian invasions and the collapse of the Roman Empire, there were further assimilative processes. The agricultural peoples of the Middle East, with the exception of the Jews, lost their identities in the early Islamic period (Goitein, 1974). Moreover, Christianity steadily disappeared in parts of the Arab empire, but flourishing Jewish communities remained even after Jews were relegated to a subservient, humiliated status. Similarly, Lea (1906-07, 139ff) notes the existence of Ostrogoths, Visigoths, Celt-Iberians, and Romans in seventh-century Spain, but only the Jews survived as an independent ethnic concentrates on what can be proved from the evidence of different academic disciplines.

GENTILE REACTION

In Separation and Its Discontents, he examines three different eras of 'anti-Semitism', namely the later Roman Empire, 15th century Spain and National Socialist group – the others presumably becoming completely assimilated via intermarriage."

According to MacDonald's analysis, the Greeks and Romans were in general relatively relaxed about ethnicity and what we would today term 'multi-culturalism'. Foreigners could become naturalised just by adopting the language and culture of the Greco-Roman world. In contrast, the whole point of Judaism, its entire raison d'être, was the resisting of alien cultures, and the maintaining of strict separation.

JEWISH MEASURES TO MAINTAIN RACE PURITY

While the peoples conquered by the Greeks and Romans eventually assimilated their conquerors, the Israelites – as is shown by a reading of the Books of Joshua and Isaiah – tended to commit genocide in order to create and retain an ethnically pure state.

Separation and Its Discontents studies the extent to which Jewish group behaviour stimulates anti-Semitism. MacDonald sees most 'anti-Semitism' as a mirror image of the Judaic viewpoint. 'Anti-Semitic' Gentiles – whether white, black or Asian – in most cases merely have equally strong emotional attachment to their own ethnic identities as do ethnically conscious Jews.

Though his subject matter is controversial, MacDonald continues to maintain his neutral stance. He doesn't suggest that Jewish behaviour is worse than any other peoples', merely that their tactics are often more successful than are those of Gentiles. MacDonald would presumably assent to Ezra Pound's sensible statement that: "It is nonsense for the Anglo-Saxon to revile the Jew for beating him at his own game." He is careful to avoid any conspiracy theorising on the grand scale as in the style of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and instead

Germany, coming to the conclusion that each of these episodes involved the birth of a powerful Gentile group cohesion, as a direct reaction to the almost overwhelmingly successful group strategy of Judaism.

But while A People That Shall Dwell Alone and Separation and Its Discontents are of great interest in understanding the historic basis of Jewish-Gentile relations and ethnic conflict in general, The Culture of Critique is of vital importance in understanding the 'here and now'. The Culture of Critique is subtitled An Evolutionary Analysis of Jewish Involvement in Twentieth-Century Intellectual and Political Movements.

MacDonald boldly asserts of the 20th century, one of the most disastrous eras ever in recorded in history, that:-

"The 20th century in Europe and the Western world, like the 15th century in Spain, was a Jewish century because Jews and Jewish organisations were intimately and decisively involved in all of the important events. If I am correct in asserting that Jewish participation was a necessary condition for the Bolshevik Revolution and its murderous aftermath, one could also argue that Jews thereby had a massive influence on later events."

Of course, such comments, in even a heavy academic book, bring about the usual howls from the usual quarters, but this is yet another example of extreme Jewish ethnocentrism. Israel Shamir's humorous aside about such attitudes sums up the situation: "How dare you say 'The Americans nuked Hiroshima'? I am an American, and I did not nuke Hiroshima." As the anecdote indicates, other nationalities do in general seem much less hypersensitive to criticism.

As MacDonald indicates, the Communist regime established in Russia in 1917 was dominated, not by Russians, but by 'ethnic outsiders', chiefly though not exclusively Jewish. He goes on to say that this was not a 'Nazi' perception by any means, but one shared by the leading politicians in the Western World, such as Balfour, Winston Churchill, Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson. Indeed Churchill was most forthright on this matter with his famous article of 1920 which referred to a "world-wide conspiracy for the overthrow of civilisation."

Jewish Bolshevik leaders: Leon Trotsky (real name Bronstein) on left; Grigori Zinoviev (real name Apfelbaum) in centre; and Karl Radek (real name Sobelsohn) on right. The dominant representation of Jews in the Soviet régime following the Revolution in Russia in 1917 provoked strong reactions in the Gentile world.

MacDonald notes that Jewish individuals were not only prominent in the Soviet leadership, but also numerous in the secret police apparatus – the Cheka, GPU and NKVD – that ran the largest system of concentration camps in the world. He quotes Leonard Schapiro to the effect that: "... anyone who had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the Cheka stood a very good chance of finding himself confronted with, and possibly shot by, a Jewish investigator."

Along with German historian Ernst Nolte, MacDonald says that the heavily Judaic composition of Communism – as seen also in Bavaria and Hungary, as well as Russia – was one of the prime reasons for Hitler's wish to destroy the USSR and for the anti-Jewish measures of the German National Socialists. Thus the 1917 Revolution was the defining event of the 20th Century, since without it in all likelihood there would have been no World War II and no Cold War.

MacDonald's succinct summing up of the years that followed 1945 is that: "The victory over National Socialism then set the stage for the tremendous increase in Jewish power in the post-World War II Western World. This new-found power facilitated the establishment of Israel, the transformation of the United States and other Western nations in the direction of multi-racial, multi-cultural societies via large-scale non-white immigration, and the consequent decline in European demographic and cultural pre-eminence."

This quote neatly brings us to one of the major themes of The Culture of Critique:

how and why did this Euro-American decline come about, and in such a comparatively short time?

MacDonald comments that:-

"At the intellectual level, Jewish intellectuals led the battle against the idea that races even exist and against the idea that there are differences in intelligence or cultural level between the races that are rooted in biology. They also spearheaded defining America as a set of abstract principles rather than an ethno-cultural civilisation. At the level of politics, Jewish organisations spearheaded the drive to open up immigration to all of the peoples of the world. Jewish organisations also played a key role in furthering the interests of other racial and ethnic minorities, and they led the legal and legislative effort to remove Christianity from public places."

WHITE GENTILE WEAKNESS

But underlying all this is a specific weakness on the part of white peoples. MacDonald suggests that Northern Europeans, due to their background of Ice Age Europe, were less subject to ethnic competition, and therefore evolved to be much less ethnocentric, xenophobic and collectivist than Middle Easterners and Asiatics.

Hence the extreme vulnerability of our people, when subject to persistent 'cultural warfare', as was practised during the 20th century. Now central to the psychological assault on western values is the 'Holocaust' cult, which MacDonald describes as "the elevation of Jewish experiences of suffering during World War II... to the level of the pivotal historico-cultural icon in Western societies."

MacDonald quotes an Israeli writer, Boas Evron, on this quasi-religion, as saying that: "the real aim of which is not at all an understanding of the past, but a manipulation of the present." As a result of this manipulation, 'perpetual-victim' status is assigned to a dominant political, intellectual and economic group, since – to pick just a few statistics from the US out of many – out of a population proportion of 2-3 per cent, Jewish executives make up 60 per cent of the media élite, and Jewish per-capita income is double that of the country's Gentiles.

Additionally, the way is made clear for the massive US subsidies to Israel, and the perpetual warfare that this engenders (now claiming, at the time of writing, a US serviceman a day in occupied Iraq). Says MacDonald:-

"My perception is that the Jewish community in the US is moving aggressively ahead, ignoring the huge disruptions Jewish organisations have caused in the West (now mainly via successful advocacy of massive non-European immigration) and in the Islamic world (via the treatment of Palestinians by Israel). Whatever the justification for such beliefs, US support for Israel is by all accounts an emotionally compelling issue in the Arab world. A true test of Jewish power in the United States will be whether support for Israel is maintained even in the face of the enormous costs that have already been paid by the US in terms of loss of life, economic disruption, hatred and distrust throughout the Muslim world, and loss of civil liberties at home."

Kevin MacDonald's work – though substantial parts are accessible to the general reader – is very much the writing of an academic and specialist. It deploys complex arguments and is heavily footnoted. For explanations of its subject matter, one of the most vital issues of our times, some may go instead to Ivor Benson or Douglas Reed. For 'inside information', as it were, the writings of two Jewish defectors to the cause of the West – one of the past, the other very much of today – namely Ben Freedman and Israel Shamir, may be preferred. Nonetheless, Professor MacDonald's outstanding and exhaustive survey demands our close attention as we seek to understand the ultimate causes behind the continuous decline and destruction of our society.

It is necessary to stress that the following article, like some others by the same writer, represents the writer's personal views only, and should not be taken as representative of editorial policy nor of any political party that this magazine supports. It should also be stated that we do not intend that this article will be the start of a long exchange of opinions on Christianity and paganism, extending over several months – as a few of our readers would like. We have more urgent matters with which to fill our space.

THE FACT that even the Anglican Church has been penetrated by left-liberals just proves how totalitarian, in the literal sense of the word, Britain has now become. Liberalism has now totally absorbed all our major institutions. The Anglican Church was once the living embodiment of the white English people and their culture, and the most beautiful aspect of their architectural heritage: something to be treasured, defended and conserved.

But not any more. The changes in the values of the Ministry have nothing to do with reinterpreting Biblical doctrine; in fact, they go against all Biblical teaching. For example, the ordination of women priests came about not because of any re-interpretation of theology but in order to give equal opportunities to women. All very laudable, but the Church isn't a golf club, where membership rules can be changed by a show of hands.

The fact that the Church leadership should even have been thinking of appointing 'gay' bishops or priests is just one more sign of moral and cultural deterioration in the one institution in which you would least expect it. Many on the right look on the steady leftward drift of the Church of England with loathing. Every Archbishop since Dr. Ramsey in the 1960s has done his best to undermine our Christian values, and all have been appointed by naïve politicians, totally unaware of the powerful cultural forces at work behind the scenes of the country they think they govern. They thought that a little bit of 'modernisation' would help stem falling congregation attendances.

Each Archbishop more liberal

All of them, instead, have been taken for a ride, since every Archbishop has been more, not less, liberal and socially destructive than the previous one; and all of them have actually accelerated the decline in church attendances. At the same time, they risk splitting the Church into, not two, but several conflicting and opposing factions. Some church leaders want to join the Catholics, and others want to link up with other presbyterian ministries: anything to stop the disgusting rot.

There is a sneaking fear that many of the top bishops and archbishops don't actually believe in the Christian faith and its doctrines. Many of them should actually be slung out of the Church. They have become the enemy within. Far from halting the cultural decline and racial and social fragmentation of this country, they have done their best to the Church of England in the slightest. Indeed, many Anglican clergy think that a 'multi-faith' Britain is a good idea. They get away with it because they know that all the other power-brokers in this country believe the same thing.

Are the Bishops determined to destroy Britain?

In the July 2003 issue of Spearhead a recorded talk by Kevin Alfred Strom speed it up. The fastest growing religion in Britain and in Europe is Islam, which has not been challenged or opposed by pointed to the remarkable power of early Christianity in uniting all the white tribes of Europe under the Christian banner, and routing the Moslems and expelling the Moors from Europe.

But Strom made an interesting point that has been echoed by fringe movements on the Right for many years: the source of European cultural greatness is in our scientific, architectural and musical heritage. Many have always suspected the treacherous undercurrents in the Christian religion, and Strom reminds us that we must define ourselves firstly in ethnic and cultural terms, and put our race and its proud history first, in the same way that other races do.

Races need their own religions

An often overlooked point is that every civilisation, every ethnic creed, has had its own religion reflecting its own legends, myths and ancestral folklore. The white Europeans had Nordic, Saxon and Pagan, not Judeo-Christian, religions, which came originally from the Middle East. Some actually go so far as to say that the Christianisation of Europe has been tragic because it has been seen to be naturally antipathetic to community or national ties, and its

STILL NOT SATISFIED

Peter Tatchell and his followers are seen here demonstrating at the Church's General Synod in York last month. For them, the Clergy are not moving fast enough towards complete liberalisation. Note on Tatchell's poster a non-PC word that has almost disappeared!

practical effect has been to undermine the harmony and unity of our people.

The Pagan Right has for years pointed to the inevitability of the ultra-liberalism that is inherent in Judeo-Christianity. The problem is that, alone of the world's religions, it is internationalist in spirit and recognises no borders. Other religions, even Judaism itself, are race- and culture-specific, and do not believe that their own societies are responsible for the suffering of the whole world, or that they need to atone for it.

The Pagans themselves are a small and rather fragmented cultural movement. They believe in blending the best insights of our ancestors with science and ecology. They try to restore the memory of the beliefs and rituals of European villages and the rural areas of old.

Many Paganists are followers of Asatru, an early religion of a north-western Europe inhabited by the Germanic tribes that became today's ethnic communities that speak Germanic languages, which, of course, includes the English.

In the Runestone, an American journal "celebrating the indigenous religion of European Americans," we read of the preaching of courage, honour and strength and of the importance of acknowledging family and ancestral bonds. Christianity, by comparison, has feminine values and is excessively self-abasing and cloying. It over-values the 'meek' and the poorest (which might be a euphemism for the most feckless and incompetent).

The North Wind is an interesting 'Yearbook of the Odinic Rite' (Odin was an important Saxon god), containing rather poetic and whimsical tales of early Saxon peoples. Occasionally, however, a forthright and bitter article will appear highly critical of Christianity's legacy. Andreas Ludwig sees great danger in the growth of Islam in Europe that Christianity has done little to combat. Whereas the latter is globalistic, the former is imperialistic and militant. It wishes, says Ludwig, to transmit an Arabian culture virtually by foreign conquest rather than by spiritual conversion.

Another Nordic writer, Thor Sannhet, has nothing but contempt for America. After the war, its citizens turned to occult beliefs and demonised and marginalised its fundamentalist Christians, who at least attempted to preserve their European heritage.

Darkening of America

Parasitism and vampirisation now rule, as the white community allows massive transfers of wealth to alien recipient groups, who now have powerful religious institutions working for them in the media. "America," he writes, "has become a darkening social miasma with increasingly Third World characteristics, tainted with the stench of decadence and evil. The voices of Asgard (an Odinic god) have gone unheeded, and so chaos and Ragnarok and Loki (Nordic devils) have come as a sure reward for folly."

The more cerebral Pagan Right, largely the prerogative of European intellectuals, agrees with these sentiments. But, rather than returning to forms of ancient worship, they wish to give more emphasis to the pre-Christian political, philosophical and cultural heritage of the Greeks and Romans.

The Pagan right has an acronym, GRECE, which stands for the French equivalent of the Movement for the Study of European Civilisation. They deplore the fact that during the 20th century totalitarian movements have arisen which have been inimical to Europe's progress and cohesiveness, especially Marxism and capitalism, which have both been internationalist in ethos and have emphasised economism and materialism.

Fascism, instead, was nationalistic, but it was non-ideological because nationalism does not have a universalistic application. It is surprising how often this is misunderstood. A further marked difference between the 'isms' is that only liberalism believes in an open-frontiers policy, which clearly the Soviets and Fascists did not. The Fascist leaders, in both Italy and Germany, were also more interested in and sympathetic to the earlier pre-Christian religions.

However, it is inevitable that the New Right in Europe quite naturally distances itself from any overt criticism of Judaism because of the appalling legacy of fascist-inspired anti-semitic excesses. Nevertheless, the impact of white Jewish culture on the West has been profound: it has contributed enormously to our cultural and scientific progress. But at the same time it has legitimised the existence of diasporas, and has been indirectly responsible for the cultural norms manifested in the scores of new books on immigration and human rights that say, in so many words, that immigration should be a right for everyone, regardless of its effect on the recipient countries.

All this is on the fringe, of course. Paganism is complicated, dated and sub-cultural, and hardly likely to generate a mass following among people in quest of spiritual hope or a better life.

Yet the Pagan and New Right have shown up the legacy of liberal Christianity for what it is, especially its cultural treachery and its sham claim that it represents the unchanging attitudes and values of the indigenous people of Britain and Europe (as it once did), and listens to their grievances, wishes to preserve and protect Europe's moral and cultural heritage from foreign conquest and alien beliefs.

Its critics provide an important insight as to where Europe and White America have gone disastrously wrong, and why their indigenous peoples may not even survive as races in their own homelands. Paganism would never, because it believes in cultural self-preservation, have allowed alien forces and alien people to acquire the enormous influence that they do in present-day Europe.

THE National Health Service has had problems of one sort or another ever since its formation sixty years ago. The Labour Government blames the present problems – chronic waiting lists and under-staffing – on years of under-funding by the previous Tory government. To try to resolve this it has been pumping billions of pounds of public money into the service for the past six years but doesn't seem to have improved matters to any great extent at all.

The Tories claim that these sums of extra money are exaggerated and are often already budgeted. There have been improvements in staff pay and working conditions and possibly, as time goes by, this may bring in more staff. Perhaps even larger pay increases is the only way to aid recruitment.

Another claim by the Tories is that there is too much 'waste', but their views carry little real weight in view of their own performance when they were in power.

Attempts made by management in the NHS to bring in extra staff apart from normal recruitment have only made problems worse.

First of all, they employ agency staff. These are usually NHS-trained nurses who can earn more money by joining a nursing agency. These agencies charge high fees. It was claimed that for some specialist nurses the agencies demand £70 an hour. The nurse, of course, only receives a fraction of this.

It seems incredible that the NHS can afford to pay this sort of money but it does. The NHS should try to eliminate agencies who charge such ridiculous sums.

PROBLEMS OF OVERSEAS RECRUITMENT

The NHS has also been recruiting staff from overseas, again at considerable cost. Some of these come from Europe – Spain and Finland are two examples – and many have to take English lessons before they can take up their duties. Others come from English-speaking countries, such as the USA, Australia and New Zealand. The cost of bringing these staff over here must be heavy.

The most controversial area of recruitment is the 'Third World' – countries such as the Philippines, India and those of Africa. For decades, we in this country have been bombarded by demands from various charities to provide money food and medical supplies to be sent to the Third World, so it seems totally illogical and unethical that the NHS should poach nursing staff from such countries. The charities themselves have only made half-hearted protests against these policies.

There have also been press reports claiming that some nurses from Africa have been found to have the AIDS virus. Evidently they aren't checked medically before they come here; and when they've arrived they've been allowed to stay – no doubt with treatment thrown in – but they aren't allowed to practise nursing.

And once again, nurses from some Third World countries have to learn English before they can work.

Some are being employed in private nursing homes where it is said that they are being exploited and underpaid.

Doubts have also been cast on their nursing skills. During the trial of a matron accused of neglect at a private nursing home in the West of England it was claimed that many foreign nurses "had not had a great deal of experience at giving basic hands-on care."

It can be appreciated that nurses from Third World lands could be attracted here, since pay and working conditions in Britain are far superior to those in their own countries.

However, it seems odd that nurses from America, Europe and Australia should want to join the NHS – it can't be so bad after all!

It might also be asked whether any check is kept on foreign nurses once they come here. Is there anything to stop them applying for better-paid work in the private sector or even outside nursing? Presumably, the NHS trusts pay for their accommodation when they first arrive. For how long does this go on?

Recruitment of foreign staff is nothing new in the NHS. In the 'fifties and 'sixties nurses and support workers were brought in from Commonwealth countries to boost staffing levels. These were mainly from the Caribbean and the Indian sub-continent. It was claimed by some that these immigrants were the mainstay of the NHS – though this was something of an exaggeration. If anyone called for an end to mass immigration in those days, liberals would respond by saying: "What would you do if there were no coloured people to run our hospitals?"

"Cheer!" was one answer to this.

Occasionally there are reports in newspapers of court cases involving medical staff who have made errors of judgement in treating patients resulting in them suing for damages, or even dying. In many of these cases the medical staff are of foreign origin.

Another reason for not employing foreigners in the NHS!

IMMIGRANTS EXPLOITING SERVICE

Immigrants have always made use of the NHS. In some cases there are reciprocal arrangements with other countries agreeing to treat British nationals. The Department of Health and the Tory opposition are at last waking up to the cost of foreigners taking advantage of the service. Many asylum-seekers arriving here are receiving free treatment for their ailments having never contributed a penny during their lives in the way of insurance payments. This causes great indignation among the indigenous inhabitants, especially those who have been on waiting lists for a long time.

Regrettably, some NHS staff and many liberals still believe that the service should be free for all!

Early in 2003, a convicted drug-dealer in Scotland was ordered to be deported to Jamaica. Her doctor protested against this as she was suffering from AIDS and wouldn't be able to have the treatment she was receiving in this country!

Quite obviously this doctor is badly out of touch with reality. It is largely because of people like of him that the NHS is in such a state.

More use should be made of the voluntary sector to treat foreign patients. Separate medical facilities should be set up, funded by those who want the foreigners here.

Recently the NHS has been sending patients to Europe for treatment – to France and Germany, for instance. Provided costs aren't too heavy, this seems a reasonable policy with our own health service in the condition it is, but it does seem illogical that we are treating foreigners for whatever ailment they have and sending our own people overseas.

TREATMENT IN INDIA

In June 2003, health chiefs in India announced that they could treat patients from the NHS. Even when the cost of air flights is included, it is cheaper this way!

If there is surplus medical capacity in India it should be used to benefit the 'suffering millions' in that country.

There is also some doubt as to whether the facilities and medical skills found in India are of the standard of those in Britain and Europe.

It might be an idea, though, to send all asylum-seekers claiming treatment from the NHS to India on a one-way ticket. This would help solve a lot of our problems!

The BNP should, then, campaign for even greater improvements in the salaries and conditions of work in the NHS to encourage more staff from the indigenous population.

The recruitment of foreign staff should be actively discouraged – especially when it is from Third World countries. All foreign nurses are needed in their own health services and shouldn't be poached to work over here.

An investigation should be held to try and ascertain what proportion of NHS patients are foreigners taking advantage, and then to refuse them treatment. If they object, we should deport them without further ado.

These proposals won't solve all the problems of the NHS but they will help with some chronic cases, particularly those which haven't been looked at before because of political correctness.

An end should be made to various Labour gimmicks, such as the endless 're-organisations', 'League tables' and attempts at fiddling the waiting lists. However, there is little doubt that the NHS is going to have problems for a long time to come – not just because of government interference but by way of its own bungling and inefficiency. Any government in power must keep a close watch on it.

A day in the life of one of our elected representatives

The chap on the left in this picture is Clive Betts. Mr. Betts is Labour MP for the Attercliffe constituency of Sheffield. Rather unfortunately for him, he was caught in this somewhat – shall we say – ‘compromising’ position with his boyfriend, one Jose Casparo, a would-be immigrant from Brazil and a male prostitute for whom he (Betts) secured a parliamentary pass under the guise of engaging him as a ‘research assistant’. In addition to this, the people’s representative for Attercliffe used a forged fax from a college in order to give Jose ‘student’ status so that he could get through immigration controls to reside in the UK.

But Mr. Betts broke the eleventh commandment: he got found out! He was hauled up before a Commons Standards and Privileges Committee, which imposed on him the brutal punishment of a seven-day ban from the House. In a statement to the press, he claimed that he had done nothing to bring Parliament into disrepute. Meanwhile, former ‘gay’ Tory candidate for Brighton Pavilion, David Gold, has described the treatment of Mr. Betts as ‘homophobic’.

THE SHAWCROSS THEY DIDN'T QUOTE

AS the world knows, Lord Shawcross, best known as Sir Hartley Shawcross, died at his Sussex home on the 10th July. He was 101.

Unquestionably, Hartley Shawcross's main claim to fame lay in his role as the chief British prosecutor in the trials of the German leaders at Nuremberg in 1946, in which the brilliance of his advocacy earned him a world-wide reputation. He subsequently became a prominent figure in the early post-war Labour Party but later became disillusioned with the party. Years afterwards, he briefly associated with the Social Democrats before withdrawing from politics altogether.

Upon his death last month, the papers were full of extensive, and mostly glowing, obituaries, describing in much detail his long, varied and undoubtedly interesting life, giving particular attention to his legal career and, most of all, his outstanding performance at Nuremberg. But what every paper, to our knowledge, omitted was the fact that Shaw-

LORD SHAWCROSS
Lived to regret Nuremberg

cross in later life expressed bitter regret over the way the trials were conducted and, perhaps even more significant still, over the whole tragic saga of World War II which preceded them. At a speech in Stourbridge on March 16th 1984 he astounded his audience by saying:-

“Step by step, I have arrived at the conviction that the aims of Communism in Europe are sinister and fatal. At the Nuremberg trials I, together with my Russian colleagues, condemned Nazi aggression and terror. I believe now that Hitler and the German people did not want war. But we declared war on Germany, intent on destroying it, in accordance with our principle of the balance of power, and we were encouraged by the Americans around Roosevelt.

“We ignored Hitler's pleading not to enter into war. Now we are forced to realise that Hitler was right. He offered us the co-operation of Germany: instead, since 1945, we have been facing the immense power of the Soviet Empire. I feel ashamed and humiliated to see that the aims we accused Hitler of are being relentlessly pursued now, only under a different label.”

An appropriate epitaph!

Ethnic groveller of the month?

We reproduce on this page three particularly nauseating pictures of leading 'establishment' public figures doing their best to ingratiate themselves with the ethnic minorities in Britain. Can any reader supply an even worse picture illustrating the same theme, whether it is of one of these people or someone else of prominence? If we receive a picture which we judge more revolting than any of these, the sender will receive a year's free subscription. Entries in by the 18th August.

Tory leader Iain Duncan Smith is seen on the right conferring with two Rastafarians in Handsworth, Birmingham. These two gentlemen have assumed the titles of 'peace officers' from the Haile Sellassie Peace Foundation.

A Times Online report on the 27th June said of the meeting: "Mr. Duncan Smith, on a drive to broaden his party's appeal, chatted with them about their patrols, which were set up two years ago to break down barriers between police and the local community."

There has been a lot of talk in the newspapers of late concerning the alleged extravagance of Prince Charles, and leftish-inclined journalists have been at pains to upbraid the Prince for not making greater economies in his lifestyle.

For our part, we think a lot of this agitation is just a red herring. Royalty, by its very nature, needs to maintain a certain degree of grandeur and pomp in order to preserve the mystique so necessary to its standing among its subjects. The financial upkeep of the Royals is not something undertaken as a favour to them personally; it is done in order to maintain a vital national institution – vital whether the Royal Family as individuals live up to it or not.

Much more important is whether the Royals earn the perquisites of their rank by performing the desired public services to the nation which we are entitled to expect of them, and whether they conduct themselves in public with the dignity befitting their station. HRH Prince Charles is one who, unhappily, does not, as the picture of him on the left making a clown of himself at a Sikh temple in Southall glaringly illustrates.

Cherie Blair can ethnic-grovel with the best of 'em – as befits one whose views are some way to the left of her husband's. She is seen in the picture on the right on an occasion when she and Tony visited India last year.

When we British ruled India in the old days our public representatives there were expected by protocol to maintain a civil and courteous relationship with their subject peoples. Nevertheless, while doing so they still retained their dignity as Britons. It is unlikely that any of them ever felt bound to adopt the ingratiating, cringing expression and pose that we see here from Mrs. Blair. But of course Cherie is a woman of her times and of her party. These days it is the done thing for any senior Labourite when meeting members of non-white races to indulge in the very worst exhibitions of self-abasement possible. One wonders what is in the minds of these Indian ladies as they witness this stomach-churning behaviour by the wife of a British prime minister. What do you think?

'Spearhead'

SIR: It was with absolute disgust that I read the article by Nick Griffin in the July issue of Identity magazine in which he devoted four pages to a political and personal attack on John Tyndall; and one of the most contemptible references in this article is where he (Griffin) speaks of Mr. Tyndall's now long-distant connection with a cranky political group in the early 1960s and says that it "not only played an absolutely key role in the failure of the National Front to break through in the 1970s but... would still today prove fatal to the ambitions of any political organisation that would countenance him as leader in 21st century Britain as well."

When he wrote these words Mr. Griffin must have presumed either that we all have short memories or that none of us keeps records of his previous writings. In an article he wrote in Patriot magazine in the Spring of 1999 he spoke of the 1970s National Front (then led by John Tyndall) in a manner full of praise for its achievements, highlighting some of its excellent election results, talking of it doing "extremely well" in the local government elections in 1976. Further on, he referred to the party's disappointment at the modest votes in the general election of 1979. In connection with that election, he spoke of its internal aftermath and the efforts made by certain disloyal elements to disrupt the party from the inside by exploiting this disappointment in order to pursue their own agenda. Here is what he then said:-

"Humiliated candidates and naïve members looked around for scapegoats, and a cleverly organised campaign of subversion supplied them. Pictures illustrating the youthful errors of several of the national leadership, complete with foreign-looking armbands, had featured heavily in the intensive smear campaign which had been run by the Labour Party, the Anti-Nazi League and sections of the media for several years. Such propaganda had been used more intensively throughout the far more successful local election campaigns and parliamentary by-elections from 1976-78, during which it seemed to have had little impact (letter-writer's emphasis), but a new populist wing now used worries over the material to whip up hostility to the leadership."

In Mr. Griffin's latest emissions he has clearly performed a 180-degree turn from the viewpoint expressed in that 1999 article concerning the effects of smear propaganda relating to past political indiscretions, as well as to the actual achievements of the NF under Mr. Tyndall's direction. And while we are on the subject of past political indiscretions, should we not focus on something that also happened in the past but not nearly as long ago as the early 1960s? This was when sometime in the late 1980s Mr. Griffin and a colleague visited Libya to beg support from Colonel Gaddafi, no less, and the two were photographed in front of a gigantic portrait of the Libyan dictator. Our political enemies have frequently used this photo to discredit the BNP and no doubt will do so again. Colonel Gaddafi, in case anyone has forgotten, was (and possibly still is) a backer of the IRA and is generally perceived, whether correctly or not, to have been behind the Lockerbie bombing in which large numbers of innocents died.

I would respectfully suggest that Mr. Griffin shut up about the past, that he lay off the ad-hominem attacks and deal - honestly - with the real issues that are causing arguments in the BNP.
NAME & ADDRESS SUPPLIED

(EDITOR'S NOTE: The writer of the foregoing letter has requested that we do not publish his name since, this apparently being the 'purging' season in the BNP, he does not wish to forfeit his membership for the 'crime' of internal dissent).

TO READERS: I have been deeply involved in nationalist politics for nearly 30 years. Along with others, I have been through the trials and tribulations: the constant abuse from the politically controlled media, the unbelievable vindictiveness from the Establishment, the anarchic Rent-a-Mob lefties, and much else. In fact, with my husband I was set upon and beaten up by a crowd of these animals in East London six years ago.

But at the end of the day the internal troubles in our party have annoyed me most of all - troubles stoked up by opportunists who pretend to be nationalists. These people are about as sincere as Tony Blair.

My husband has not always been perfect or right - and that applies to most of us. But I will say this about John Tyndall: he has always put the BNP and its ideals first, and he has never wavered in his dedication. Personally, he has not made a sausage out of the nationalist movement; but in fact, at times, we have even helped people out of our own pockets. I only know of a handful of people up and down the country who are as sincerely committed to our cause as my husband is. I do not say this because I am married to John Tyndall. I say it because it is a fact.

John Tyndall and his closest colleagues and friends built the BNP and kept it going through hard times and better times. The increased support the party is now getting has not been due to any changes within but because of the growing anger of the British electorate, who are at last at the end of their tether with the Establishment and its disastrous handling of this country's life and future.

VALERIE TYNDALL

SIR: Having seen the June Spearhead in which Tony Lecomber has defended himself against various charges, we feel bound to demand the right of reply to the part where Mr. Lecomber describes us as "thieves and robbers" and having "broke into the home" of the London & Essex organiser to rob him of the party's collection money.

It is not true that we broke into the home in question. If anyone is in doubt about this, they should feel free to contact Limehouse CID (East London) and/or the Essex Constabulary. Money was taken and kept which was owing to us for expenses incurred in organising a party meeting; all other money was shortly afterwards handed back to the party.

The genuine version of these events can be found in a five-page bulletin from us via the usual channels. All we ask from Mr. Lecomber is that if he wishes to libel us he should have the legal bottle to use our names.

DAVE HILL & BOB JAMES
East London

(EDITOR'S NOTE: By our printing this letter it should not be assumed that Spearhead takes sides in this dispute. We are only doing so in the interests of fairness, just as for the same reason we printed the Lecomber defence to which it refers).

SIR: Have you noticed the 'new line' now being promoted in the mass media. It is said that the foreigners now being brought into the country are needed here. The argument is that the population of Britain is ageing, and that without new blood there will not be enough younger and working people to pay its pensions.

The argument is badly flawed. It does not take account of a previous argument from much the same leftish quarters, which said that birth control and abortion were necessary because we have too many mouths to feed. As a result of abortion, some six million babies in the womb have simply been executed. If these babies had been given life, we would have quite enough of our own people to ensure that pension funds were kept up.

SIR: The row going on between the Germans and Italians over Silvio Berlusconi's remarks to a German MEP just illustrates the ridiculous lack of proportion of Europe's modern politicians.

Berlusconi was riled by the behaviour of Mr. Martin Schulz during a debate, and retorted that he would be well cast for a film role as a guard in a concentration camp. In any adult company this would just have been laughed off as a not very brilliant joke but nothing more. But the affair has been allowed to build up into a serious international quarrel. National stereotypes and name-calling have been habitual in the press. There have been threats of cancelled holidays. So much for united Europe!

Are you ready for the new Europe?

After she had been stoned by her family, Semsye Allak, pregnant by a married man, took seven months to die, and a few weeks ago was buried in a pauper's grave. In another case three brothers threw their sister off a bridge because she was a prostitute. Amazingly, their life sentences were reduced because her unseemly behaviour was considered a provocation. 'Honour' killings, or attempts to kill, are, it seems, still fashionable in Turkey, the country that wants to join the EU, and which George W. Bush hoped would be his ally against the wicked, brutal and awful Saddam Hussein!

Potty and Pitiful

This autumn, Bristol University will instruct all of its departments to reduce the required A-level grades for students from schools with a history of poor examination results. Thus, the worse the school's record the more favourably the student will be treated. Meanwhile, over at the history department at Oxford, we read that over-worked, underpaid dons are struggling to cope with the high numbers of poorly prepared undergraduates. Looks as though tutors at Bristol will soon find themselves working round the clock!

Definitions and jurisdictions

Last January, with what might perhaps be termed a touch of old-world dignity, Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court ruled that Port Vale football fans chanting: "You're just a town full of Pakis," a taunt directed at visiting Oldham supporters, was neither racist, insulting nor criminal. This was not good enough for the DPP, who appealed and managed to get this eminently sensible decision reversed. Lord Justice Auld argued that the chant implied that Oldham was inferior because of the nationality or ethnic origin of a number of its citizens, that those of Pakistani origin were the cause of that inferiority, and that the word 'just' in the chant was indicative of this.

Marvelling at the learned judge's ability to analyse these matters with such astonishing precision, we wondered, idly, how the bench might deal with the ancient and provocative ditty, "I've got a lovely bunch of coconuts." It would, we believe, be perfectly clear that, "I've got," implying as it does sole possession, and perhaps even superiority, could be considered distasteful and therefore unacceptable. Additionally, while "lovely" and "bunch" with their respective connotations of sexual attraction and permissiveness, would not be out of place in our liberated society, these words could, nevertheless, be construed as intentionally offensive to the members of any sect which happened to worship the coconut.

The peacemakers (Part 1)

Hamid Karzai is the puppet that the Americans put 'in charge' of Afghanistan almost a couple of years ago. The 'President', reputed to have the most dangerous job on earth, has miraculously survived three assassination attempts, though his deputy and another minister in his 'government', have both been killed. The palace guard consists of former US servicemen armed with M-16s, AK-47s and night-vision goggles, all paid for by the State Department. Karzai's writ runs no further than the capital, Kabul, and even here bomb and grenade attacks are almost daily events. His own 'cabinet' is said to be full of people who would like him out of the way. It seems that nobody takes any notice of him, a situation graphically illustrated when last year his sacked minister of the interior set up road blocks to prevent his replacement arriving.

Outside of Kabul, the warlords, firmly in control of the country, frequently collect border taxes and customs duties and fail to pass them on to the Government. But luckily, only this May we had an authoritative statement from US defence secretary Donald Rumsfeld that "Afghanistan is mostly secure." Meanwhile the Taliban – ostensibly the reason for the invasion in the first place – has regrouped and is displaying new boldness in its attacks on coalition forces, and has formed a leadership council dedicated to the overthrow of the detested Karzai regime and its sponsors.

The peacemakers (Part 2)

A recent article by Professor Michael Clarke in The Sunday Times, discussing the role of the British forces in Iraq, used the words 'peacekeeping' or 'peacekeepers' no less than six times. To us, this bore all the hallmarks of a stunning exercise in self-deception.

Let us be clear beyond all doubt that Iraq was at peace with the world until that peace was shattered by a cowardly and unprovoked attack in which Great Britain, to our everlasting shame, became involved, so that today Iraq is an occupied country. And, as every schoolboy knows, in all occupied countries since time immemorial, you invariably find a resistance movement dedicated to making life hell for the occupiers. It matters not whether these people are pro-Saddam, anti-Saddam, Shia or Baathist or whatever. An enemy rules their land and, in their time-honoured code of conduct, they claim the right to dispatch as many of that enemy as possible, together with any who collaborate with it.

Only fools will derive comfort from the deaths of British personnel, but then it was fools who sent them to Iraq in the first place.

A lawless land

So do we really believe that the time has come to put the tanks in? Listen to what 133 judges and magistrates told the Prison Reform Trust in a recently published report: "The growth in crime, particularly serious crime, has been fuelled by rising levels of drug and alcohol misuse. A general decline in family and moral values in society has contributed to high levels of lawlessness. We are seeing nastier work more often, particularly associated with drugs. There is more violent crime than there was five years ago, very often drug-connected."

And there we have it. Drugs! Drugs! Drugs! Drugs that are killing our young folk, who in turn are killing our older folk to get the money to pay for them. Blunkett has no idea how to stop the rot, and in several areas the police are no longer in control. Military commanders should be empowered to occupy such districts to 'search and arrest' as necessary, using whatever tactics are required to clean up the streets, and soldiers should patrol those streets until every vestige of drug-dealing has been eradicated and the offenders properly dealt with! We'll have to do it one day. Why not now?

But has this venerable column been outflanked, for once, by the dynamic leader of the Tory party? He would solve the problem by building more rehabilitation centres. Wow! Now why didn't we think of that?

Another Canterbury Tale

"Church sacrifices gay bishop," ran the headline. Good heavens! (no pun intended). Did that mean that the near-bankrupt Anglicans were trying to boost their disastrous ratings by introducing a few of the good old pagan rites? Well not exactly. In fact it was just the half-expected announcement that Dr. Jeffrey John would not, after all, become the Bishop of Reading. So, are we to believe that someone, somewhere, showed a modicum of common sense? Again the answer is negative. Some wealthy, evangelical, Oxford parishes habitually pass on substantial surplus funds to 'regional head office', but they indicated quite clearly that this would dry up if a homosexual was appointed to the top job at Reading. And such action, taken nationwide, could cost the Church at least £200 million a year, enough to put it out of business altogether! Maybe it is time for the parishioners – the paying customers – to insist that every Church functionary be required to affirm that he follows the precepts laid down in his own Bible, or find another job if he can't.

RICHARD EDMONDS was the guest speaker at the July meeting of the Wigan group of the British National Party. The meeting, which was held in a location close to Wigan town centre, was attended by around 40 members and supporters. The meeting was chaired by Ian Hague. Ian spoke about the recent events in nearby Bolton, where local members had distributed around 1,000 leaflets in a very small target area and the overwhelming response that the party had received from this, including the usual hysteria from the mainstream parties. Ian went on to say that the number of enquiries from such a small-scale activity had been excellent, and that the Bolton Evening News ran a front-page headline about it. He then went on to thank the people who helped out at the recent barbecue and said how successful it had been as a fund-raising event for the Wigan group. He then spoke about the local BNP newsletter that the Wigan group distributes in its target wards and said that a new issue of it was in the process of being edited.

Ian then introduced local election agent Richard Close, who also stood as a candidate in this year's elections. Richard spoke about the need to field more candidates at next year's council elections and the need to raise funds for next year's European elections. He also mentioned the new Red Rose club, where members pledge to pay £10 a month to raise funds for the party.

After a short interval Ian then introduced veteran nationalist Richard Edmonds, who spoke about the betrayal of the British working class by past governments over the last 50 years and the damage done to the country caused by the European Union, for which he blamed former Tory Prime Minister Edward Heath for starting the process back in 1973. Richard stated that traitor Heath had conned the electorate over the then 'Common Market' by saying that it was a trade-only agreement and nothing else. He went on to speak about the misery caused by uncontrolled mass-immigration and the social problems that it causes. When he mentioned Enoch Powell, the one mainstream politician who had the courage to speak out against this, he was greeted by loud applause.

He went on to attack the current New Labour Government by saying that there is something very sinister about the name 'New Labour' and all the rotten things it stood for. He then went on to thank Dennis Shambley and Richard Close, who both stood at the recent council elections, by saying the results had been excellent in what was once considered a Labour stronghold, and that both men were a fine example of the type of person who is going to stand up for Britain and the British people. He went on to say that the British National Party is the only party that is going to stand up for Britain, and he urged people to support it. He received a very long round of applause at the end of his speech.

A collection was held and a substantial sum of money was raised for local funds. The members then went on to enjoy a buffet kindly provided by the host of the venue.

JOHN TYNDALL

The book you must read if you want to find out what John Tyndall and the BNP stand for

The BNP Oldham branch was privileged at its monthly meeting for July to have two excellent guest speakers. First was Nick Cass, the Dewsbury organiser. Nick gave a brief history of the once-proud country of Rhodesia which since independence has deteriorated into a poverty-stricken hell-hole where attacks upon white people are commonplace, and where even when Whites are murdered the authorities take no real action in trying to hunt down the killers. What is happening in that country is ethnic cleansing of Whites. If the situation were to be reversed and a white government were treating non-Whites in a similar way there would be a worldwide outcry.

Nick Cass said that what is happening over there is now beginning to happen in Britain too. In any town or city with sizeable communities of immigrants, eventually the communities separate to be with their own; and the people of Oldham can testify as to what happens if you live in area where immigrants decide to settle in large numbers: sooner or later, either because of intimidation or lack of community spirit, the Whites eventually leave, and so develops an area the immigrants call their own.

After the break, BNP founder-member and former national organiser Richard Edmonds took the stand. Richard gave a reminder to the people of Oldham that, thanks to the tremendous votes the party received there in the 2001 general election, the BNP quickly became a household name in the area and gave the people of Britain hope that, instead of the traitors known as Lib/Lab/Con, there was a political party that did actually represent the silent majority of decent patriotic Britons. He reminded people how at one time the Soviet Union appeared to be so powerful it could never be defeated, but thanks to the ordinary people of Eastern Europe and Russia rebelling and protesting the Soviet Union collapsed. He used the comparison of the Soviet Union to show how sometimes we may think that the multi-cultural liberal régimes that have been destroying our country for decades may sometimes seem unbeatable, but just as with the Soviet Union any regime or form of government that is run along the lines of deception, lies and corruption will eventually fall, and it is our job to aid in its fall.

As the meeting came to a close, Oldham organiser Mick Treacy thanked the 50 people in attendance but called for a better turn-out of local members at future meetings.

The Euro Election

It has been alleged in the BNP general members' bulletin for July that our editor and his supporters in the party have been trying to undermine the party's campaign for next year's elections to the European Parliament. This is a despicable distortion.

In private correspondence between Mr. Tyndall and BNP chairman Nick Griffin Mr. Tyndall has expressed some differences concerning the respective priorities to be given the Euro Election and the UK local government elections also scheduled for next year. His opinions are privately shared by some others, including, quite possibly, supporters of Mr. Griffin.

Nevertheless, now that the decision has been made to make the very maximum input into the Euro Election, in both active effort and money, it is the duty of all party members to support that campaign in every way they can.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent,

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence another need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be appreciated. Thanks.

EXCELLENT MEETING AT DERBY

THE best-ever British National Party meeting to be held in Derby took place on June 24th, when Richard Edmonds and John Tyndall were guests of the local BNP branch.

The meeting was attended by 90-100 people, the vast majority Derbyshire members and supporters. It was opened by organiser Stef Sheppard, who announced the speakers and then handed over to the first speaker, a local man, Simon Bennett, who gave an interesting talk about how he found his way to the BNP.

John Tyndall spoke next. He began by mentioning a report in the South London Press, which was also featured on page four of last month's Spearhead. What the report revealed, he said, was something of the mentality of the opponents of the BNP, who seem outraged wherever and whenever our party establishes a presence in an area; and we are supposed to be the 'intolerant' ones!

The BNP, he went on, would debate with its opponents on any issue, anywhere and at any time. But they refuse to debate with us. What does that tell us?

Mr. Tyndall then gave a number of illustrations of what an insane asylum Britain had become under 'New Labour', giving examples such as the recent permission given by police chiefs to 'gay' officers to march in homo processions; the way in which the country is taking in huge numbers of immigrants infected with the HIV virus; not least, the sell-out of manufacturing industry. Speaking at the home of the famous Rolls Royce company, he said it was a national disgrace that this great company had been allowed to fall under foreign ownership.

Another example of national insanity, he said, was the keeping in Iraq of 15,000 occupying troops for the next five years at a cost of over £9 billion at a time when national defence expenditure was being cut to the bone in the interest of 'economies'.

Mr. Tyndall went on to assert how essential nationalism was to this and any other nation which wanted to survive in a tough world. We may be prepared to embrace internationalist doctrines but there will always be other nations that will not, and in that event they will inevitably be stronger than us and will get the better of us, he said.

TYNDALL SPEAKS
Nationalism essential to the survival of a nation in a tough world, he said.

Tyndall ended by listing briefly the essentials of British recovery. We must get out of Europe. We must stop – and reverse – immigration. We must restore discipline and order in every area of the nation's life. Not least, we must reform the institutions of government so as to ensure strong and capable leadership.

Richard Edmonds made the final speech. He reminded the audience that the BNP had been founded 21 years ago for the purpose of standing up for the British people against the betrayals committed by the old parties. He stressed that Britain's current race problems are the direct fault of successive Tory governments. Macmillan let in the West Indians in the 1950s, Heath let in the Asians in the 1970s, and in the 1980s Margaret Thatcher opened the doors to immigration from literally all four corners of the world.

Mr. Edmonds went on to say that it was also Heath who took the first step in signing away the nation's independence by taking us into the Common Market in 1973. Thatcher, in her turn, made Britain a signatory to the Single European Act in 1986.

It is evident, he said, that the 'Conservative' Party does not conserve Britain, and the only one good thing one can say about the party is that it looks to be finally on the way out. To great applause, he concluded: "And good riddance to bad rubbish!"

Mr. Edmonds then described his pleasure at being invited to speak at some of the BNP's branches in the North of England, where he was able to confirm real progress being made in towns such as Burnley, Halifax and Rochdale. "When one meets BNP councillors in these towns," he said, "and sees what patriotic people they are and how seriously they take their civic duties, then one can see that the BNP is the party of the future, that we are successfully putting down roots and that we are the new voice of the British people."

He concluded by saying that the key to the way forward for the BNP was perseverance, discipline and intelligence.

Both Mr. Tyndall's and Mr. Edmonds' speeches were greeted with prolonged applause.

SHORTLY before this issue was put to print we read the four-page article by Nick Griffin in the July issue of Identity magazine attacking our editor. What is notable about this article is that its author, not content merely with expressing disagreement with Mr. Tyndall on political and tactical questions concerning the BNP, goes to great trouble in heaping personal abuse on him as well. In recent articles in Spearhead in which we have criticised Mr. Griffin on some policy matters we have refrained from attacking him personally. Indeed no article containing any such personal criticism has been published in Spearhead for four years, and even then nothing was said which descended to the level of vilification reached in this latest piece in Identity.

We could very easily publish a long point-by-point rebuttal of the arguments in Mr. Griffin's article, but we are inclined to think that this would evoke a groan from many readers along the lines of: "Oh no, not more of this!" It would therefore be best just to confine ourselves to this relatively very short comment.

In his Identity article, Mr. Griffin is at pains again and again to attribute dishonourable motives to those who disagree with him and to suggest that they are only interested in exploiting policy differences for their own ends, which he suggests are those of destabilising the party in order to retake it from him and his group. He conveniently omits to mention that his takeover bid in 1999, timed exactly when the BNP was gearing up to contest the Euro Election of that year, undoubtedly had a destabilising effect.

It is noteworthy that in his article Mr. Griffin cannot resist repeatedly referring to Spearhead as a 'private-profit' magazine. Well, we do not recall him objecting to the fact that our magazine is privately run when he was engaged as its editor and drew most of his living income from it for three years in the 1990s. In fact, anything that could reasonably be called 'profit' where Spearhead is concerned simply does not exist; it is necessary that its editor draws a modest income in order to perform the work that has to be done to ensure that it comes out in its full 28 pages regularly every month; that is all. We suspect that this income is somewhat smaller than Mr. Griffin draws from the BNP – while being far, far smaller than that which he would earn if elected as an MEP in Europe, even allowing for half of this going to the party. In addition, we might mention that in the BNP of John Tyndall's time just four people were paid money, of whom he (Griffin) was one. We understand that this number has now risen to over 30.

Do we need to say any more?
